With Central and Southeast Europe's accession to the European Union, regional development is becoming a central field of both European and national policy. The focus of this book, however, is not structural policy. The case studies from Poland, Hungary, Romania and Ukraine analyse the formation of actors, institutional arrangements, networks, and identity discourses in the 1990s. The emphasis is on the ongoing process of making regions and the effects of regional history, economic structure, and macro-political framework on its shape and outcome.

We would like to say some words of thanks to all those people who have made these two volumes possible.

Local and regional politicians, civil servants, experts and activists of social interest organisations and NGOs, businessmen and women, journalists, and fellow academics have taken the time to share with us their expertise, thus making this book possible. Above all we thank them for their patience and understanding. During the fieldwork we also received support from local and regional actors and organisations, such as the Timisoara city hall, especially the staff of the Department for Strategy and Urban Development, and Cornelius Ochmann who helped to open many doors in L'viv.

In our efforts to understand our findings and in writing up our results we have greatly benefited from discussions with numerous colleagues who helped us with their critical remarks and advice. We are especially grateful to Ilona Pálné-Kovács and Rainer Deppe, who did not only contribute to our Hungarian case study but also made many useful suggestions on our overall
