EDITORIAL

This issue marks an important transition point for the BFSA Journal because Joe Morrow ends his tenure as editor. Joe's energy, creativity, and commitment were instrumental in launching and then maintaining publication through these first few years. His flexibility and astute judgment made the Journal an open forum for the presentation of ideas, and the stimulation of debate, that might not otherwise have had a scholarly outlet. Those of us committed to integrating behavioral analysis and progressive social change hope that this public acknowledgment of Joe's efforts is not too delayed to serve as contingent secondary reinforcement!

BFSA has been an incredibly democratic organization throughout its brief history, a policy that I intend to maintain as I assume the editorship of the Journal. In this regard, I urge anyone who is interested in becoming more involved with the Journal to contact me. Two immediate possibilities present themselves: submission of manuscripts and volunteering to serve on the editorial board to review manuscripts. And, of course, your ideas, comments, and suggestions are welcome at any time.

The Journal's policy will remain unchanged. We will consider any philosophical, theoretical, or empirical contribution concerned with behaviorism and social change. Though we are inevitably political, we endorse no particular political ideology, but instead, welcome all perspectives which seek to redress social injustice. The dangerous and discouraging political situation in the world today requires that we intensify our efforts and utilize all opportunities to stimulate progressive social, political, and economic change. We hope that the BFSA Journal will continue to provide one such opportunity.
