We would like to take the opportunity to share with our readers some exciting news about the journal.

2015 marks an exciting turning point for The Review of Economic Design. The journal has evolved vastly since its first issue thanks to the invaluable support of the profession and the diligent work of authors, our referees and editors. John Ledyard and Semih Koray have been most critical in that success. After investing immense amounts of their time and effort in the journal, they have decided to step down from their roles as Editors-in-Chief. The journal would have never been where it is now without their presence. We would like to extend our gratitude to John Ledyard and Semih Koray for their invaluable service to the profession during their tenure as Editors-in-Chief at the journal.

Also, the editorial board has been restructured in order to serve the profession more efficiently. The new structure involves an advisory board and an editorial board, each with well-defined and non-overlapping roles at the journal.

We have also welcomed new members to the editorial board. While meeting an increased number of submissions in the timeliest manner, the journal also strives to bring in new voices and vision, and to open to new fields that have connections with the theory or applications of economic design. We would like to extend our gratitude to our new editors for agreeing to serve on the editorial board, as well as to all of our editors for their invaluable service and support towards achieving our goals at the journal.

These are exciting times for the journal. We, the editors of the journal, look forward to a productive future.

On behalf of the editorial board,

Atila Abdulkadiroglu, Tilman Borger, Fuhito Kojima
Editors-in-Chief, Review of Economic Design
