The original version of this article unfortunately contains an error in the Abstract section. In particular, it was mentioned by mistake that prevalence of anxiety is 30.8%, which is incorrect. The prevalence of anxiety should be 37%, as pointed in page 735 both in the Results text and Table 2.

Therefore, the correct sentence (10th–12th line of the Abstract section from the top) should now be:

“Depression and anxiety were documented in 21.8 and 37 % of the population, respectively, and correlated significantly with quality of life.”
