Harmonization of law can be either indicative, basic rules prevail but are translated various by into the different legal bodies, or the same rules apply similarly all over Europe irrespective of the legal context. In the case of consumer law, the European Commission is about to move from setting one to setting two and this volume discusses some implication.

The draft Consumer Protection guideline² was published on October 8, 2008 by finalizing the law on consumer protection the authors argue the Commission leads to an ossification, a lack of competition among legislating Member States and thereby in fair to a weakening of the legal position of consumers.
