The original version of this article unfortunately contained two mistakes.

First, I would like to add the following acknowledgment:

Second, in footnote 18, I write:

And Husserl, who is largely responsible for discovering the phenomenon of presence as absence, writes that the sensuous or intuitive contents in perception, which are responsible for presenting us with objects and properties, are nothing for themselves; they are appearances-of only through the intentional horizons that are inseparable from them (Husserl 2001, p. 43).

As the language of this passage indicates, part of it is a quotation from Husserl. The passage should read:

And Husserl, who is largely responsible for discovering the phenomenon of presence as absence, writes that the sensuous or intuitive contents in perception, which are responsible for presenting us with objects and properties, "are nothing for themselves; they are appearances-of only through the intentional horizons that are inseparable from them" (Husserl 2001, p. 43).
