Transition from Year to Year

December reminds us to celebrate and appreciate the present.

December reminds us that we have beginnings and endings.

December reminds us of family, friends, acquaintances, and those around us who have always been there.

December reminds us to acknowledge the past.

December reminds us to bring learning into the future.

December reminds us of opportunity and renewed hope found in the future.

Transitioning from December to January reminds us to acknowledge what was.

Transitioning from December to January reminds us to be mindful of what is.

Transitioning from December to January reminds us to be accountable for what can be.

Transitioning from December to January reminds us of the continuing of life and potential.

January brings the responsibility to clean, organize and prepare for what lies ahead.

January brings the accountability to oneself to question inequality and the misinformed, meet the challenges of today and tomorrow, participate in improving fairness and true justice, and contribute to the knowledge and positive advancement of the human condition.

As one grows wiser, one sees the less importance of the “I” and the more importance of the “We.”

I would like to take this moment to appreciate this forum provided by Springer, the support provided by the Springer Staff, the quality of the Sexuality and Disability's Editorial Board and Reviewers, and the excellent content provided by our Authors. Thank you.
