This issue of TechTrends includes columns and articles that I hope you will find interesting and useful for your research or practice. Columns in this issue include Rethinking Technology & Creativity in the 21st Century, History Corner, Professional Ethics, Graduate Member Musings, and after a long hiatus the ICT International column makes its return with an update on distance education in Turkey.

Abbie Brown opens the articles in this issue with his account of a year-long study of 3D printing. Next, John Curry, Paul Czarapata, Doyle Friskney, Paige Hale, Kate Hill, and Chris Miller provide report on how their program at Morehead State University has leveraged participation in AECT events as mentoring opportunities for their doctoral students. If you are curious about app development, Ken Luterbach and Kenneth Hubbell provide a comparison of some tools that might be helpful to you. Katie Goeman, Jan Elen, Bram Pynoo, Johan van Braak provide a report on a study of technology integration that was conducted in Dutch-speaking schools in Belgium; compare and contrast it with what you know about schools in your local context. BYOD initiatives are spreading through schools in the U.S. Derick Kiger and Dani Herro report on a study of parents' perceptions of BYOD. Next, Bianca Lochner, Rita-Marie Conrad, and Edward Graham provide their results from a stages of concern investigation of public school teachers' adoption of learning management systems. Finally, Craig Union, Lori Union, and Tim Green close out the issue with a study of eReaders in third-grade English/Language Arts classes.
