to happen, teams of cohabitation researchers will need to collaborate jointly in this enterprise and have policymakers define the cohabitation issue as an important research question that they will support by providing the necessary funding and sponsorship. This is not likely to happen unless there is a shift in the political and socioreligious climate in American society.

—Charles Lee Cole
Iowa State University

ERRATA

Please note the following corrections to "Jealousy in Sexually Open Marriages" by Bram Buunk, which appeared on pages 357-372 of the August 1981 issue of Alternative Lifestyles:

- Although otherwise suggested (pp. 361, 366), the subsample of 100 people that was selected for more extensive questioning was the same as the one on which the paper on groundrules in sexually open marriages (Buunk, 1980b) was based.
- It is not clearly indicated that the respondents had to answer the "jealousy scale" (p. 360) about their reactions on the extramarital sexual involvements of their partners.
- The data on which the conclusion about the close link between the experience and expression of jealousy (below on p. 370) is based, are lacking. They can be found in Buunk (1980a).
- Some figures under "Sex differences in jealousy" are incorrect. On p. 362, t (248) is stated four times; these figures should have been, respectively: t (98); t (216); t (248); t (98).