This issue of the Indian Economic Review is the first to be published by the new editorial team.

Over the last seven decades, the IER has reflected changes in economic thinking in general, and in India in particular. From development planning to modern development economics, from structuralist to monetarist perspectives on macroeconomics, from general equilibrium social choice to agency theory, from international trade to agrarian structure, and a range of other topics, the IER has featured articles on the entire gamut of modern economics.

Most recently, the journal was edited by Pami Dua, who ably steered the journal for several years. We owe her a debt of gratitude for her stellar service.

The new editorial team hopes to continue to improve the quality and impact of the IER. Our aim is to make the IER the journal of choice for scholarship on all topics of economics, especially research pertaining to India. To this end, we hope to publish, in addition to the two regular issues, special issues dedicated to specific themes. We look forward to strengthening our relationship with the journal's contributing authors and referees who are in large measure responsible for the journal's success.

We invite prospective authors to visit the journal's home page <https://www.springer.com/economics/journal/41775>, which also provides guidelines on submission.
