Notes on Contributors

Contemporary Political Theory (2014) 13, 1. doi:10.1057/cpt.2013.46

George Ciccariello-Maher is assistant professor of political science at Drexel University in Philadelphia. His first book, We Created Chávez: A People's History of the Venezuelan Revolution, was recently published by Duke University Press, and he is currently revising a second volume forthcoming entitled Decolonizing Dialectics.

Kamila Stullerova teaches political theory and international relations at the Department of International Politics, Aberystwyth University, UK. Her research interests are at the intersection of political theory, international relations theory and security studies. She recently published an article on human rights in International Politics and is currently co-editing a book on critical approaches to the study of world politics, entitled Security and Emancipation, and preparing for publication a monograph on Judith Shklar.

Sharon Stanley is associate professor of political theory at the University of Memphis. This article represents the beginning of a new project on the concept of racial integration in the United States. Her previous project explored cynicism in the French Enlightenment and the present, and was published as a book, The French Enlightenment and the Emergence of Modern Cynicism, by Cambridge University Press in 2012.