Editorial

This Editorial is not going to be about esoteric issues in quantitative fund management, rather it will focus upon a regime shift that is particular to the Journal of Asset Management and a number of companion journals formerly owned by Henry Stewart Publications — namely, that they have recently been acquired by Palgrave Macmillan, and this is the first JAM Editorial under the new owners.

Readers who are happy with the existing form of the journal may be reassured that the transition has been very smooth and that the Journal will stay upon its previous trajectory. This should not be misinterpreted as editorial complacency; the new opportunities that come with new owners will, I am confident, lead to a number of improvements.

New details for submission, subscription, advertising and even letters to the Editor are listed at the end of this issue; I hope that the Journal will continue to grow and that its essential function, namely as a focal point for ‘quants’ to display their research, will continue much as before.
