
Editors' Introduction

Editors' introduction to 'Reflections on the Revolutions of our Time'

Lynne Layton^{a,*} and Peter Redman^b

^aMassachusetts Institute for Psychoanalysis, 253 Mason Terrace, Brookline, MA 02446, USA.
E-mail: layton@rcn.com

^bFaculty of Arts and Social Sciences, The Open University, Milton Keynes, UK.
E-mail: peter.redman@open.ac.uk

*Corresponding author.

Abstract The journal editors introduce a new thread of short pieces that will reflect on current political events. The thread begins with two short pieces on Trumpism.

Psychoanalysis, Culture & Society (2017) 22, 1. doi:10.1057/s41282-017-0044-1

Keywords: psychoanalysis; politics

In the run-up to and aftermath of the U.S. election, we received a few short essays that seek to make some kind of sense of what is going on politically across the globe. Brexit, the crackdown in Turkey, anti-immigrant and anti-Muslim movements all over the world, the rise of ISIS, Trumpism – we at PCS are feeling an urgent need to get our bearings in what, to many of us, is an increasingly irrational and dangerous world. In this issue, we present two think-pieces about Trumpism, one on nostalgia and one on disgust. While PCS does not host a blog, in this moment we would like to commit to publishing, in each forthcoming 2017 issue, one or two pieces that focus a psychoanalytic lens on current political events. We invite our readers to contribute to this new thread, 'Reflections on the Revolutions of our Time'.

Lynne Layton and Peter Redman.
Co-editors, Psychoanalysis, Culture & Society.