ASO VISUAL ABSTRACT

ASO Visual Abstract: A Prospective Study Evaluating the Accuracy of Indocyanine Green (ICG) Fluorescence Compared with Radioisotope for Sentinel Lymph Node (SLN) Detection in Early Breast Cancer

Dorin Dumitru, MD, FRCS^{1,2}, Sujit Ghanakumar, MD³, Elena Provenzano, MD³, and John R. Benson, MD, FRCS^{3,4}

¹Breast Services, Breast Unit Castle Hill Hospital, Hull University Teaching Hospitals NHS Trust, Cottingham, UK; ²Hull York Medical School, Hull, UK; ³Cambridge Breast Unit, Cambridge University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust, Cambridge, UK; ⁴School of Medicine, Anglia Ruskin University, Cambridge, UK

This prospective study assessed the performance of indocyanine green (ICG) fluorescence for sentinel lymph node (SLN) identification compared with the standard radioisotope tracer agent. Overall rate of identification was 98.7% with ICG being noninferior for detection of SLNs compared with radioisotope (<https://doi.org/10.1245/s10434-021-11255-9>).

DISCLOSURE The authors declare no conflicts of interest.