Call for Papers on Teaching Demonstrations and Tutorials

Many phenomena and concepts in behavioral research can be illustrated to students most effectively through software and video demonstrations and tutorials. A limiting factor in the use of such materials by instructors is knowledge of their existence and lack of easy accessibility. In part to remedy this situation, I am inviting submission of manuscripts describing demonstrations, tutorials, and experiments that can be used in instructional settings to further education regarding behavioral research. Manuscripts received by November 1, 1997, will be considered for a special issue or section of Behavior Research Methods, Instruments, & Computers devoted to teaching demonstrations and tutorials. It is my hope that all individuals who have developed materials of this nature that would be of interest to a range of instructors will submit manuscripts and make the materials described in them readily available. The teaching demonstrations and tutorials of authors who consent will be placed at a Web site from which they can be accessed. Manuscripts should be sent in quadruplicate to Robert W. Proctor, Department of Psychology, Purdue University, 1364 Psychology Building, West Lafayette, IN 47907-1364.
