If they had still been able to count on the Ulster Unionists they would have been the single largest party and Heath might have been able to continue at the head of a minority administration.

8. Peter Mandelson and Roger Liddle, The Blair Revolution (London: Faber, 1996). Roger Liddle had been a special adviser in the Callaghan Government, and had then joined the SDP. After 1997 he became a special adviser again, in the Downing Street Policy Unit. Peter Mandelson, the grandson of Herbert Morrison, had been appointed to run the Shadow Communications Agency by Neil Kinnock, and had become a key Labour Party strategist, and a key confidant of first Neil Kinnock and then Tony Blair. He then became a key minister in the Blair government, but was forced to resign twice.
9. The Labour left never secured the leader of their choice (Tony Benn), failing narrowly to have him elected Deputy Leader in 1981. They never had a majority in the Shadow Cabinet. Their main power base remained the National Executive Committee of the Party. See Eric Shaw, The Labour Party Since 1945 (Oxford: Blackwell, 1996); Patrick Seyd, The Rise and Fall of the Labour Left (London: Macmillan, 1987).

11. The wording of the old Clause IV was as follows: 'To secure for the workers by hand or by brain the full fruits of their industry and the most equitable distribution thereof that may be possible upon the basis of the common ownership of the means of production, distribution and exchange, and the best obtainable system of popular administration and control of each industry or service.' The new clause is: 'To work for a dynamic economy, serving the public interest, in which the enterprise of the market and the rigour of competition are joined - with the forces of partnership and co-operation . . . with a thriving private sector and high quality public services.’
