This book is the culmination of a long period of research, teaching, advocacy and activism on the part of its authors. It is also the product of the generous support provided by an extensive network of individuals and institutions. The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada and the Advisory Research Committee of Queen's University provided financial support for the research. We are grateful to Jennifer Nelson and Briar Towers at Palgrave, and Virgil Duff, for their perseverance and encouragement in the publication of the manuscript. Mukesh, V.S. of Newgen provided meticulous copy-editing of the manuscript. Expert research assistance at various stages of the study was provided by: Ceylan Cesur, Claudine Charley; Maria Leynes; Anne-Marie Murnaghan; Lorie Scheibelhoffer; and Marcia Williams. The Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Carleton University and the Department of Political Studies at Queen's University, and the many vibrant, articulate students who have participated in our classes, provided rich environments for testing our ideas about women's work, globalization and citizenship.

In the Philippines, Hong Kong and Singapore, we were welcomed into the homes and offices of numerous people and people's organizations who generously offered their time and knowledge. Particular thanks are owed to Gabriela, Migrante, Batis, BAYAN, Kanlungan and the family of the late Flor Contemplacion. In Canada, invaluable advice and information were provided by migrant, domestic workers and nursing associations. In Toronto, these included INTERCEDE, the Philippine Solidarity Group, the Coalition for the Defense of Migrant Workers' Rights in Canada, the Philippine Nursing Association, the Black Nurses Association and the Coalition of Visible Minority Women. The Montreal-based Association des aides familiaux du Québec allowed us to follow the experiences and conditions of domestic workers in Quebec. In Vancouver, we benefited from the generosity of the West Coast Domestic Workers' Association in giving us access to their files and documents. We owe much in terms of the insights we gained and support of our scholarship to Cecilia Dioscon and the many courageous activists associated with the Philippine Women's Centre in Vancouver. We are immensely grateful to all the domestic workers and nurses who agreed to participate in this study and who offered some of their precious non-work time to tell us about their experiences. We are also indebted to government officials in Canada and the Philippines, placement agency owners, hospital human resource managers and all those who were willing to speak to us and share their views regarding the negotiation of citizenship.

Several friends and colleagues have helped us in numerous ways. Pura Velasco was our intrepid guide and advisor in the Philippines and has been a major source of inspiration, advice and feedback throughout our research. Yasmeen Abu-Laban provided critical feedback and suggestions about the citizenship theory informing our work. We benefited from Pearl Rimer's breadth of knowledge on childcare.

Some of the arguments in this book have appeared in earlier versions elsewhere. Specific citations appear in this work accordingly, and we are grateful to the publishers for permission to use this material. Our intellectual debts are made explicit in our extensive endnotes and bibliography.

Our families fostered supportive conditions for writing this book while having to put up with our absences and the pressures associated with its preparation. Ignas Stasiulis provided Daiva with shelter and sustenance in Toronto, and Maia Stasiulis reminded her daughter of the strength and resilience of all the migrant women who had arrived in Canada as domestic workers to make a better life for their children. Adam McNally and Rachel Kellogg managed various stages of growing up with grace and strength, and endured their mother Abbie's long working hours at the same time. David and Mildred Bakan, and Clare and Mary Kellogg were ever present as a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Throughout, Radha Jhappan and Paul Kellogg have not only lent to this project their valuable skills with respect to critical scholarship, editing and technical support, but also their sympathetic ears, forgiving hearts and unstinting patience.

This work is written equally and jointly by the authors. Any errors or weaknesses are our responsibility.
