New Perspectives in German Political Studies

General Editors: William Paterson OBE is Honorary Professor in German and European Politics at the University of Aston and Chairman of the German British Forum.

Charlie Jeffery is Professor of Politics at the University of Edinburgh.

Germany remains a pivotal country in Europe. It is Europe's biggest economy, continues to play a central role in the European Union, and has a growing significance in international security politics based on its strategic location at the centre of Europe and its evolving role as a provider of security in Europe and beyond. All this is nuanced by the legacies of a turbulent recent history: the two World Wars, the Holocaust, Germany's division after World War II and its unification in 1990.

New Perspectives in German Political Studies has been designed as a platform for debate and scholarship on contemporary Germany. It welcomes contributions from political science, international relations, political economy and contemporary history. It follows on from the success of the earlier series on New Perspectives in German Studies, co-edited by William Paterson and the late Professor Michael Butler.

Acknowledgements

This book is the culmination of several years' work on German politics, and could not have been written without a great deal of support from friends, family, and colleagues.

I am extremely grateful to both the Economic and Social Research Council, and subsequently the University of Birmingham, for financial support.

I am also very grateful to officials, politicians and other professionals who took time out of hectic schedules to discuss the issues addressed in this study.

Colleagues and friends at Birmingham University's Institute for German Studies provided a great deal of help. Special thanks are owed to William Paterson and Thomas Poguntke for reading sections of the manuscript and offering very helpful advice.

Thanks are also due to Otto Wurbs, Adelheid Mallach and Nadine Müller for putting me up (and putting up with me!) while I was undertaking fieldwork, as well as providing many useful suggestions and impulses. Nadine Greulich was also very kind and hospitable. Antonia Bance generously looked after my commitments in Oxford while I was away on fieldwork. Especially in the early years, my friends Siobhan McAndrew and Rick Muir were a frequent source of guidance, entertainment, inspiration and delay to progress!

My interest in policy change at the sub-national level in Germany developed during a spell at the Geschwister-Scholl Institute in Munich in 1998–99. I am particularly grateful to Florian Bieberbach, Florian Sipek, Christoph Moosbauer, Ulrike Boesser, and Nikolaus Gradl for their camaraderie during this time, and for demonstrating the deep-rooted convictions on which sub-national political engagement can be based.

Particular thanks are due to Charlie Jeffery, for his help in the early stages of this study, and to Simon Green throughout, for never-ending patience in dealing with a recalcitrant colleague, and keeping faith in him until the bitter end.

On a personal as well as a professional note, I owe a debt of thanks to Dan Paskins, Bill Turner, and particularly Anneliese Dodds, for discussing the ideas in this study, proof-reading beyond the call of duty, and much more besides. I am also very grateful to Frank Pattison for turning me Germanophile.

The editorial team and all the production staff at Palgrave Macmillan have been wonderful and I am indebted to them for all their patient assistance.

Finally, a debt of thanks is due to my parents. In different ways, they prompted and fostered my interests in both academic study and politics, and it is a source of sadness that they will not see this book. It does not do them justice.
