The idea of writing this book occurred to me while working on my previous book Between East and West: Israel's Foreign Policy Orientation, 1948–1956 (Cambridge, 1990). Documentary evidence which I consulted for writing the latter exposed some effects on its foreign policy of Israel's acute dependence on external sources of oil supply. The records also illuminated the crucial impact of its conflict with the Arab world on this little-known strategic position. The following study is thus a result of approximately ten years of intermittent plunging into the abyss of this subject.

The book is based almost entirely on newly declassified archival sources. I wish to thank the librarians of the following archives for their assistance: the Israel State Archive, the Israel Defense Forces Archive, the Central Zionist Archives, the Ben Gurion Archives, the Public Record Office in London and the National Archives in Washington.

For valuable comments on early drafts of the study I am indebted to Professor Haim Barkai, Professor Nahum Gross, Professor Joseph Heller, Dr Zach Levey, Professor Gabi Sheffer, and two anonymous readers. Three prominent Israeli oil experts – Zvi Dinstein, Israel Kosloff and Emanuel Racine – who took an active part in some events described in the book, offered important insights. Joseph Voet, who participated in laying the foundations of Israel's relations with Iran, shared with me his memories of two secret missions to Tehran in the 1950s.

My research was facilitated at different times by generous grants from the Avi Foundation, the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations at the Hebrew University, the Research and Development Authority of the Hebrew University, and the Israeli Academy of Science.

I would like to acknowledge with thanks the help of Mrs Haya Galai and Mr John Smith, whose editorial skills transformed the manuscript into something better.

I owe the greatest debt to my immediate family. My daughters Hili, Galia, Maya and Yael, my son-in-law Yigal and my grandchild Gai, have provided an unending series of joyful and refreshing breaks from the rigours of research, writing and revising. My spouse, Rachel, has in more ways than she perhaps realizes significantly contributed to this book through her endless encouragement and patience. I dedicate it to her with great appreciation and love.
