Acknowledgments

Once again, I should like to express my appreciation to my home university for granting me leaves of absence, and to the English department at UCLA for generously inviting me to teach there at regular intervals through the years. In addition to the pleasure of exchanging ideas with colleagues and students, those invitations have granted me access to more extensive libraries than are available to me in Israel. Professor Thomas Wortham, the department chair, has been unfailingly kind in the support and hospitality he has extended to me, not least in initiating my appointment as a permanent Adjunct Professor in the department in order to ensure the continuation of such visits.

Chapter 3 includes some material originally published in Studies in the Novel and recently reprinted in Jerome Meckier (ed.), Critical Essays on Aldous Huxley (Prentice-Hall, 1996). I have made use of it here, in considerably developed form, by kind permission of the editors.

Mr Timothy Bartlett, Mr Timothy Farmiloe and Ms Charmian Hearne have, from both sides of the Atlantic, continued to provide generous editorial encouragement and support.

Lastly, and as always, I should like to express my affectionate thanks to my wife, Faith, for her stimulating company, valuable critical comments, and lively humour – qualities ever-present, but especially appreciated during our shared visits to art centres throughout the world.
