ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I began to seriously consider the wives of the doges of Venice as a research topic, at a time when society assessed and reassessed the behavior of and roles offered to modern political wives. In reflecting back on the years of this project, I am inclined to conclude, appropriating the words of a modern “dogressa,” that it takes a village to write a book! This project has introduced me to fantastic people and institutions that have been so helpful and supportive, and have, each in their own way, shaped this work. Without them this project would not have been possible, let alone enjoyable.

Various institutions have lent technical, financial, and copyright support to this endeavor. Completion of this project would not have been feasible without the grants I have received from the Gladys Kriebel Delmas Foundation and the Office of Research and Development Administration at Southern Illinois University Carbondale. While in Venice, the archivists and librarians of the Archivio di Stato, Biblioteca Nazionale Marciana, and Museo Civico Correr have consistently been courteous, patient, and helpful. I also thank the microfilm staff at the Archivio di Stato, and the photo archives at the Museo Correr, and Osvaldo Böhm, Venice, who provided images in this work. The Pinoteca di Brera, Milan; Galleria d'Arte Moderna, Florence; and the Münzkabinet, Berlin also graciously granted permission to reproduce works in this study. In addition, I am grateful for the permission to reproduce portions of essays published by Cornell University Press and Ashgate Press. I thank New Middle Ages series editor Bonnie Wheeler, for her faith in this research and its placement among the works in this excellent collection. Palgrave editor Farideh Koochi-Kamali and production assistant Will Fain have immeasurably helped shepherd this manuscript to its conclusion, as has Maran Elancheran of Newgen Imaging Systems.

I hope that future research will take me to Venice, given not only the endless fascination it holds for me but also for the community of libraries, scholars and friends with whom I have had the privilege to associate these past years. Conversation and interaction with Karl Appuhn, Victoria

Avery, Patricia Fortini Brown, Ersie Burke, Jana Byars, Chris Carlsmith, Matteo Casini, David D'Andrea, Claire Fontijn, James Grubb, Elizabeth Horodowich, Frederick Ilchman, Lyle Johnson, Benjamin Kohl, Laura McGough, Edward Muir, Monique O'Connell, April Oettinger, Steve and Nancy Ortega, Debra Pincus, Helena Szepe, Susan Steer, Maximilian Tondro, and Jill Weinrich has immeasurably enriched this work and my life, and I am indebted beyond words for their insights and camaraderie. Thousands of miles from Venice I have found another community at Southern Illinois University, Carbondale where colleagues John Dotson, Mary Lamb, Marji Morgan, Rachel Stocking, Jonathan Wiesen, Susan Wilson, and Natasha Zaretsky have been especially supportive. I also applaud the diligent work of my research assistants, Jami Smith and Emily Taylor.

Many individuals and groups have provided rich, valuable commentary on this project. I presented portions of this work and received exacting and valuable comment at the Folger Shakespeare Library Seminar, "Artifice and Authenticity: The Ambiguities of Early Modern Venice" in Spring, 2003 and at the Southern Illinois History Department Workshop in Spring, 2004—I thank all participants and organizers. The following people have also painstakingly read and critiqued the present study. Their influence lies in these pages, and I am deeply indebted to them. I am grateful for the insightful comments and detailed editorial feedback of Andrew Bynom, Mary Frank, and Gary Radke. Julia De Lancey, Blake de Maria and Bronwen Wilson shared their knowledge of things Venetian, their extensive editorial skills and their support in equal measure. Stanley Chojnacki has been unflaggingly supportive of this project, and Dennis Romano has been all that one might hope for in a mentor.

I dedicate this work to my family and loved ones, whose encouragement and support has come in myriad forms, and without reservation. They form the foundation on which this work, and my life, comfortably rests.
