Cambridge Imperial and Post-Colonial Studies Series

General Editors: Megan Vaughan, King's College, Cambridge, and Richard Drayton, King's College London

This informative series covers the broad span of modern imperial history while also exploring the recent developments in former colonial states where residues of empire can still be found. The books provide in-depth examinations of empires as competing and complementary power structures, encouraging the reader to reconsider their understanding of international and world history during recent centuries.

Many people have helped me fashion the ideas behind this book. Ronald Robinson and John Gallagher pioneered the general concept of informal empire and my debt to them will be obvious to any reader. Wm. Roger Louis, Antony G. Hopkins, Alfred W. McCoy and James Onley, have inspired me over the years as I worked on this project. My friend and mentor, Harold Perkin, who passed away, encouraged me to tackle only the most important ideas and to write about the big picture. In particular two individuals stand out as crucial in their help by their endless conversation on the ideas that form the core of this work. My debt to Bryan Glass, founder and Director of the British Scholar Society, simply cannot be overstated. He has inspired, challenged and revised my ideas at every stage. I have especially benefited from his analysis of leading imperial historians of the past, and by his partnership in exploring the Scramble for Africa and the role of the African Lakes Company. My colleague and closest friend, Brett M. Bennett, has also read my drafts and discussed the strengths and limitations of this work with a thoroughness that makes the separation of my ideas from his own almost impossible to delineate.

Nor can I ignore the institutions and the many grants that have made this work possible. I worked on this project as an academic at Indiana University East, Macquarie University and now as a Senior Fellow at the Australian National University. A Fulbright Scholarship to Bangladesh gave me access to archives that kindled this project, while multiple grants from the above institutions brought me to archives in India, Bangladesh, Thailand, France, Italy, the United States and the United Kingdom, to name but a few. The many authors and readers of the journal Britain and the World have offered advice and constructive criticism along the way, as I laid out some of my concepts in a series of introductions to the journal. I am grateful to Richard Drayton, Rhodes Professor of Imperial History at King's College London and an editor of the Cambridge Imperial and Post-Colonial Studies Series. I am also grateful to the Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History and to Itinerario, where select portions of this book first appeared. The faults of this book are, of course, entirely my own.
