

Offending Women in Contemporary China

Palgrave Advances in Criminology and Criminal Justice in Asia

This bold and innovative series provides a much needed intellectual space for global scholars to showcase criminological scholarship in and on Asia. Reflecting upon the broad variety of methodological traditions in Asia, the series aims to create a greater multi-directional, cross-national understanding between Eastern and Western scholars and enhance the field of comparative criminology.

The series welcomes contributions across all aspects of criminology and criminal justice as well as interdisciplinary studies in sociology, law, crime science and psychology, which cover the wider Asia region including China, Hong Kong, India, Japan, Korea, Macao, Malaysia, Pakistan, Singapore, Taiwan, Thailand and Vietnam.

Acknowledgements

I would like to thank all of those who offered me advice, encouragement, and support during my research and the writing of this book.

First of all, I must offer my sincere gratitude to the 26 female prisoners who participated in the interviews. Their stories, although sad, inspired me to write this book. I hope by making the truth about them known, positive changes can be made to improve the conditions of the marginalised social groups they belong to.

I am indebted to my anonymous contacts and friends working in the Chinese criminal justice system for assisting me to gain access to the respondents, and to the duty officers for assisting me during the interviews. Without them, this research would not have been possible. I am grateful to Yongzhong, Ce and his wife Daxia, for letting me use their accounts to access the Chinese academic databases from which I obtained the published materials in Chinese for this study.

At work, I would like to thank my colleagues and friends at the Centre for Realist Criminology at Teesside University, for creating a vivid intellectual environment. Special thanks go to Georgios Antonopoulos for his comradeship, encouragement, enthusiasm, and dedication to academic research that has influenced me since 2007; Steve Hall who first encouraged me to write a single-authored academic monograph and offered advice on the proposal of this book; and Simon Winlow who worked with me on a journal article discussing female criminality in China in 2013, from which I realised feminist criminology to be uniquely critical, stylish, and fascinating. I am indebted to Philip Whitehead for reading the early drafts of Chapters 1–5. Our meetings following the completion of each draft chapter were so helpful, kept me committed to the timeframe, and convinced me that my writing was in the right direction. There are so many others to whom I am very grateful, but I am unable to list all their names here.

I would also like to thank Paul Crawshaw and Rob McDonald for their continued support within the outlet of the Social Future Institute at Teesside University, the University for supporting my fieldwork conducted in China in 2013 under its International Visiting Academic Scheme, my school for providing generous research support, and my colleagues in the law subject group for creating a friendly working environment and influencing me intellectually over the years.

I am grateful to my editors Harriet Barker, Julia Willan, and Dominic Walker at Palgrave Macmillan for first inviting me to write about my research in China at Wolverhampton in July 2013, and for all their support afterwards. I would also like to thank the reviewers for their invaluable comments and advice, and Suzanne Evans for her friendship – I relied on her magical skills for the final editorial check.

I would like to thank all the conference audience for their useful discussions and comments on the early versions of Chapters 2 and 3, which I presented as papers, respectively, at the National Deviancy Conference in June 2014 at Teesside and at the Annual Conference of the British Society of Criminology the following month in Liverpool.

Most of all, I am deeply indebted to my parents, for their care, love, and endless support. This book is dedicated to them. I owe special thanks to Dave for tolerating the long hours I spent in the evenings and weekends reading and writing, for cooking, and for everything during the time it has taken this book to come to fruition.
