Palgrave Studies in the Enlightenment, Romanticism and Cultures of Print will feature work that does not fit comfortably within established boundaries—whether between periods or between disciplines. Uniquely, it will combine efforts to engage the power and materiality of print with explorations of gender, race, and class. By attending as well to intersections of literature with the visual arts, medicine, law, and science, the series will enable a large-scale rethinking of the origins of modernity.

My initial interest in the salon was formed during my master's study at Queen's University Belfast, under the supervision of Moyra Haslett who originally fostered my interest in female communities and the Bluestockings, and kindly invited me to participate in my first ECLRNI (Eighteenth-Century Literary Research Network in Ireland) symposium at Lucan House. At Trinity I was fortunate enough to come under the guidance of the wonderful Ian Campbell Ross for the continuation of my research at PhD level. Ian has read and discussed so many drafts of this current work, always with much rigour, humour, and kindness. Completing the triumvirate is Aileen Douglas who, in her position as postdoctoral mentor, played a key role in helping me to transform the thesis into the monograph it is today. I am extremely grateful for the continued advice and supervision of all three of these mentors. They each have continued to guide and support me long beyond the termination of any official role, and their endless patience, combined with constant encouragement, has been and continue to be absolutely invaluable to me.

I am also grateful to a variety of colleagues and friends for their insight and advice over the past several years. Niall Gillespie, Anne Markey, David O'Shaughnessy, Jim Shanahan, and Patrick Walsh have provided so much practical advice and help since I moved to Dublin, and I continue to turn to them all for guidance today. Special thanks are due to Niall for taking the time to read through the final draft and offer comments on it. I have also received particularly helpful remarks on my research at various conferences and via email from Claire Connolly, Lesa Ní Mhunghaile, Finola O'Kane, and Martyn Powell. In a work that focuses on networks and literary sociability, I must mention the great work of both the ECIS and ECLRNI, as well as the assistance I have received from members of the Elizabeth Montagu network, particularly from Nicole Pohl and Betty Schellenberg, as well as the many helpful comments from my PhD extern Elizabeth Eger. Part of the work in Chapter 4 originally appeared in the Eighteenth-Century Ireland journal – and I would like to thank the ECIS for its permission to reproduce that material here.

My archival research was made much easier by staff at various institutions, including Charles Benson, Simon Lang, and all the staff in Early Printed Books at TCD; Lady Georgina Forbes who kindly allowed me to access the muniment room at Castle Forbes; as well as the staff at the Public Record Office in Northern Ireland; the National Library of Ireland; the Irish Architectural Archive; and the Royal Irish Academy. I have also had extremely pleasant and helpful dealings with staff at the Huntington Library, San Marino, California, as well as at Sheffield Archives, and Lichfield Record Office.

My research was facilitated by the generous award of a 'Texts, Contexts, Cultures' scholarship, coordinated by the Trinity Long Room Hub, with funding from the PRTL. I would like to acknowledge Crawford Gribbin's assistance throughout the programme, and the contribution of my fellow TCC PhD students. My recent receipt of an Irish Research Council Government of Ireland postdoctoral fellowship allowed me the opportunity to shape the present monograph. Many thanks are also due to my exceptionally efficient editor at Palgrave, Ben Doyle, and his equally helpful assistant Tom René, who have managed to make the process of publication enjoyable.

Academic research is not as solitary a pursuit as is often thought and I am grateful to the following people for their helpful remarks and advice since the start of this project: Sarah Crider Arndt, Toby Barnard, Roísín Blunnie, Chris Borsing, Michael Brown, Daniel Carey, Andrew Carpenter, Norma Clarke, Jane Conroy, Dara Downey, Suzanne Forbes, Rebecka Gronstedt, Raphaela Holinski, Margaret Kelleher, Gary Kelly, James Kelly, Jim Kelly, Harriet Kramer Linkin, Eoin Magennis, Jennifer Martyn, Susan McDermott, Tina Morin, Clóna Ó Gallchoir, Jennifer Orr, Shaun Regan, Daniel Roberts, Maria Anita Stefanelli, James Wood, and Julie Anne Young, as well as the extensive QUB PhD cohort.

I would especially like to thank my family – my parents, James and Deirdre, and my brother Evan – for their personal support, invigorating candour, and constant encouragement. My interest in reading was nurtured at a very young age by my mum and her vast collection of books and French magazines, collected since her own undergraduate studies at Maynooth. I also owe so many thanks to my fiancé Alan Smyth for his reassurances and support, his enduring patience and endless proofreading, and his unswerving belief in me.
