STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY EUROPE

In the past quarter of a century European society, and Europe's relations with the rest of the world, have been radically transformed.

Some of these changes came in the wake of the Second World War; others – and in particular the division of Europe – followed as a result of the Cold War. In addition, throughout the period other forces, and especially technological change, have been at work to produce a major recasting of the fabric of European society and Europe's role in the world. Many of these changes, together with their attendant problems, have transcended the political and economic divisions of the continent.

The purpose of this series is to examine some of the major economic, social and political developments of the past twenty-five years in Europe as a whole – both East and West – and to consider the problems and opportunities facing Europe and its citizens today.
