The relief felt in dispatching this manuscript to the publishers is equalled only by the sense of gratitude owed to the friends who have helped me to reach such a position. The Russian Studies Department at Keele is an academic microcosm of peaceful coexistence. Genia Lampert, the late Katia Lampert, Joe Andrew, Roger Bartlett, Chris Pike and Valentina Polukhina have offered encouragement and advice on a broad spectrum of matters Russian and Soviet. Joe and Roger took comradely solidarity to the point of reading the draft chapters. I should also like to thank Charles Duval, Roger Pethybridge and Rick Twyman for their assistance in tackling particular problems which would otherwise have eluded me. And, collectively, the delegates to the Fourth Conference of the Russian Revolution Study Group in January of this year provoked a number of last-minute reformulations. Peter Frank of Essex University has over the years lent his wealth of expertise, energy and enthusiasm to this project. And Adele Biagi, my wife, has edited the book since its first draft, purging its pages of the more horrific (and more ludicrous) excesses of historiographical and typographical deviation.

All remaining distortions and falsifications are my own.
