In writing a book of this kind, an author incurs debts to a very large number of people. First and foremost must come the inhabitants of Marandellas itself, who made available to me much primary material in the form of diaries or letters and who answered my many questions with patience and honesty. This is a book about them and their ancestors and their assistance was necessary and much appreciated; they may not agree with all my judgements, of course, and I would not expect them to do so. They have waited a long time for this book; I hope they will not be too disappointed.

Second, I was fortunate to spend several months at various times between 1966 and 1976 in the National Archives, Salisbury. If I mention Peter Emerson and Digby Hartridge specifically, it is only because they were even more helpful than the always efficient and generous staff there. In London, too, a succession of assistants in the Royal Commonwealth Society's Library burrowed in the bowels of 18 Northumberland Avenue to find me invaluable material. Academic colleagues, too numerous to list, have contributed, wittingly and unwittingly, but none so much as Robin Palmer. And in finally producing a manuscript at all, not for the first time nor, I hope, for the last time, I have to thank Anne Merriman for all her labours.

Third, I am grateful for grants from the research fund of the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland which enabled me to carry out a survey of the Marandellas constituency in July 1967, from the non-professorial travel fund of the University of Bristol, and from the Nuffield Foundation, which enabled me to visit Rhodesia for eight weeks in 1976.

I believe I have one special debt. The period from November 1965 until July 1967, during which I completed the bulk of my research, was not an easy time for a British immigrant associated with the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland to be interviewing white settlers. Called a fascist by more than one radical in Salisbury and a communist by more than one settler in Marandellas may have convinced me that I was a liberal, but it was also a source of some tension. My sanity, I like to think, was preserved by my association with Ruzawi School, which not only gave me a greater legitimacy in the eyes of local white residents but also provided the distractions – coaching cricket and rugby and teaching French and Latin – which dissipated internal frustrations. I hope the dedication makes clear my gratitude to all, children and staff, whether white or black.

Note on nomenclature: I have referred to the country in which Marandellas is situated as Southern Rhodesia, since that was its internationally accepted name throughout nearly all the period covered by this book. I have also used the terms whites and blacks rather than Europeans and Africans, since this usage is both descriptively more accurate and currently more popular. In April 1982, Marandellas was renamed Maronderas.
