General editors' preface

EVERYBODY who studies literature, either for an examination or simply for pleasure, experiences the same problem: how to understand and respond to the text. As every student of literature knows, it is perfectly possible to read a book over and over again and yet still feel baffled and at a loss as to what to say about it. One answer to this problem, of course, is to accept someone else's view of the text, but how much more rewarding it would be if you could work out your own critical response to any book you choose or are required to study.

The aim of this series is to help you develop your critical skills by offering practical advice about how to read, understand and analyse literature. Each volume provides you with a clear method of study so that you can see how to set about tackling texts on your own. While the authors of each volume approach the problem in a different way, every book in the series attempts to provide you with some broad ideas about the kind of texts you are likely to be studying and some broad ideas about how to think about literature; each volume then shows you how to apply these ideas in a way which should help you construct your own analysis and interpretation. Unlike most critical books, therefore, the books in this series do not simply convey someone else's thinking about a text, but encourage you and show you how to think about a text for yourself.

Each book is written with an awareness that you are likely to be preparing for an examination, and therefore practical advice is given not only on how to understand and analyse literature, but also on how to organise a written response. Our hope is that although these books are intended to serve a practical purpose, they may also enrich your enjoyment of literature by making you a more confident reader, alert to the interest and pleasure to be derived from literary texts.

Acknowledgements

My first debt must be to the general editors of the How to Study Literature series, Martin Coyle and John Peck, for inviting me to contribute this book. Like the good teachers they are, they have been tolerant of my shortcomings and full of encouragement and advice, and the very appearance of this book is a tribute to their hard work. I must also thank my two painstaking typists, Colin Coles and Mollie Brittan, for their help and concern. Apologies are probably in order to my students, past and present, who have found themselves on the receiving end of many of my ideas – at least they can now go out and buy the book. Finally my thanks must go to Ron, for sitting on the manuscript, and to Madeline, for everything.
