About the authors

Charles Gibb and Peter Randall are educational psychologists. Charles Gibb read psychology at the University of Dundee, graduating with an MA, and educational psychology at the University of Edinburgh, graduating with an MSc. He gained a DipEd at what is now the Northern College in Aberdeen. Peter Randall has a BSc in psychology from the University of Hull, and an MSc in educational psychology from the University of Manchester. They are members of the British Psychological Society. Both have a special interest in pre-school children and have worked extensively in this field with parents and with other professionals for whom they have run courses on the behaviour and development of young children. They have published many articles in the professional and academic journals, jointly and individually. In addition, Peter Randall is an honorary staff member of the Department of Social Policy and Professional Studies of the University of Hull and is the author of Infant Screening: A Handbook For Teachers also published by Macmillan.
