Writing a book draws on the ideas, observations, philosophies and life experiences of many. Every encounter I have had has shaped the way I perceive the world, making it difficult to acknowledge all those who have assisted me in the process. I am grateful to all of you for sharing your knowledge with me in the hopes that I would both speak your truths and become wiser. I would want to identify the students and kind workers who let me watch them struggle with difficult dilemmas, facilitate the empowerment of others, laugh with them in joy at their successes and weep with them over their failures. But this is not possible. Nonetheless, you know who you are and whether I have approximated your visions for social work.

More specifically, I would want to mention the readers who gave me their comments and insights. They have made me ask myself probing questions in responding to their views. In particular, I would like to thank my colleagues, David Phillips, Tim Robinson and Glynis Jones for their helpful criticisms. Also, I am grateful to Sue Boldock for her secretarial assistance.

To my family, especially my mother and father, I owe thanks for providing the loving care that freed up my time to work on this book day and night. Finally, to David and Nicholas, I express my humblest appreciation of their good humour in surviving without me for months on end while I got on with writing. This is not a new experience for them, but they do live in hope that, someday, I will have time to participate more fully in mundane activities that mean a lot to us.
