STRATIFICATION AND DIFFERENTIATION

SKILLS-BASED SOCIOLOGY

Series Editors: Tim Heaton and Tony Lawson

The Skills-Based Sociology series is designed to cover the Core Skills for Sociology A level (and equivalent courses) and to bring students up to date with recent sociological thought in all the key areas. Students are given the opportunity to develop their skills through exercises which they can carry out by themselves or in groups, as well as given practice in answering exam questions. The series also emphasises contemporary developments in sociological knowledge, with a focus on recent social theories such as postmodernism and the New Right.

Acknowledgements

Writing a book like this requires the help of lots of others, which I would like to acknowledge. First, thanks to Tim Heaton and Tony Lawson for inviting me to contribute to their series and for the vast amount of editorial work and advice which they gave me.

Secondly, thanks to the library staff at Amersham & Wycombe College for dealing with a whole series of requests and continuing to give excellent service to staff and students alike.

Thirdly, thanks to my colleague, Nick Madry, and my other colleagues at Amersham & Wycombe College for putting up with me.

While writing this book, I was also involved in the publication of a textbook, Sociology in Perspective, and discussions with the authors of that book helped clarify the contents of this one, so I would like to thank them all.

Catherine Gray and Keith Povey have both worked hard to turn my scribbles into something which can be published and I would like to thank them both for their expertise and advice.

Finally, thanks to Tanya Hope, Eddie Sanderson, Dan Pritchard and Alison Kirton for letting me try out some of the ideas in this book on their students, and thanks to Julian Dean, Rachel Hek, Dr Lesley Hoggart and Dr Costas Lapavistas for being good friends.

I hope you enjoy the book and your sociology course.
