I am grateful to the University of British Columbia for a Humanities and Social Sciences Research Grant enabling me to begin research for this project in 1983–84 and for granting me sabbatical leave. The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada provided a Leave Grant in the academic year 1984–85 that freed my time to write and enabled me to travel to Australia to consult the Christina Stead papers in the Australian National Library. Mrs Pam Ray, the Manuscript Librarian, and her staff were extremely helpful during the week I spent there. Professor R. G. Geering, Stead's literary executor, has kindly allowed me permission to quote from the manuscripts. He has also been most helpful in making extensive comments on early drafts of my first five chapters. My colleagues, Sherrill E. Grace and Catherine LeGrand, also provided helpful responses to early drafts of the first chapters. All errors, of course, remain my own responsibility. My greatest debt remains to Bill Brydon for his patience and willingness to renounce his own time on the computer so I could wrestle with my ideas about Stead, a writer who has interested me since I began my Ph.D. thesis at the Australian National University in 1973 on Australia's expatriate novelists. A Commonwealth Scholarship first took me to Australia and acquainted me with Stead's fiction.

Editors' Preface

The study of women's writing has been long neglected by a male critical establishment both in academic circles and beyond. As a result, many women writers have either been unfairly neglected or have been marginalised in some way, so that their true influence and importance has been ignored. Other women writers have been accepted by male critics and academics, but on terms which seem, to many women readers of this generation, to be false or simplistic. In the past the internal conflicts involved in being a woman in a male-dominated society have been largely ignored by readers of both sexes, and this has affected our reading of women's work. The time has come for a serious reassessment of women's writing in the light of what we understand today.

This series is designed to help in that reassessment.

All the books are written by women because we believe that men's understanding of feminist critique is only, at best, partial. And besides, men have held the floor quite long enough.
