As well as researches and interests of my own, this book reflects the work of many Italian historians, and particularly those who in recent years have begun to explore Italy's social and economic history in the 19th century. Even a cursory glance at the end-notes will indicate the extent of my indebtedness to their work and I hope that in transposing ideas and arguments from the contexts in which they were first developed I have not unduly distorted them. If this book contributes to widening the interest in the challenging and stimulating historical research and debates that are currently in progress on these issues in Italy, at least one of its author's ambitions will be realised.

In writing this book I have received support and encouragement from friends and colleagues both here and in Italy who are unfortunately too numerous to name. I must record my gratitude to the University of Warwick, however, for allowing me study leave, and to the President and Faculty of the European University Institute at Florence, who granted me a Jean Monnet Fellowship in 1984–85 when the research for this book was completed, and where Stuart Woolf and the members of his seminar provided me with innumerable opportunities to test and develop themes and ideas. My wife and daughters have withstood the considerable disorders that the writing of this book has imposed on our family life, and have always been an unfailing source of support and assistance. I owe very particular debts of gratitude to Adrian Lyttelton, Denis Mack Smith and Stuart Woolf who generously gave their time to read and comment on the manuscript of this book. Their suggestions have been extremely valuable, and have also saved me from many foolish errors. Those that remain are all my own work, for which I take full responsibility.
