MACMILLAN ANTHOLOGIES
OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

General Editors:

A. Norman Jeffares, formerly Professor of English,
University of Stirling
Michael Alexander, Berry Professor of English Literature,
University of St Andrews

MACMILLAN ANTHOLOGIES
OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

- Volume 1 THE MIDDLE AGES (700–1550)
Michael Alexander and Felicity Riddy
- Volume 2 THE RENAISSANCE (1550–1660)
Gordon Campbell
- Volume 3 THE RESTORATION AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURY (1660–1798)
Ian McGowan
- Volume 4 THE NINETEENTH CENTURY (1798–1900)
Brian Martin
- Volume 5 THE TWENTIETH CENTURY (1900–present)
Neil McEwan

MACMILLAN ANTHOLOGIES
OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

THE RENAISSANCE

(1550–1660)

Edited by Gordon Campbell

M MACMILLAN

Selection and editorial matter © Gordon Campbell, 1989

All rights reserved. No reproduction, copy or transmission of this publication may be made without written permission.

No paragraph of this publication may be reproduced, copied or transmitted save with written permission or in accordance with the provisions of the Copyright Act 1956 (as amended), or under the terms of any licence permitting limited copying issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency, 33–4 Alfred Place, London WC1E 7DP.

Any person who does any unauthorised act in relation to this publication may be liable to criminal prosecution and civil claims for damages.

First published 1989

Published by
MACMILLAN EDUCATION LTD
Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire RG21 2XS and London Companies and representatives throughout the world

Typeset by Wessex Typesetters
(Division of The Eastern Press Ltd)
Frome, Somerset

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
The Renaissance: (1550–1660).—(Macmillan anthologies of English literature; V.2)
I. Campbell, Gordon
820.8''003

ISBN 978-0-333-46475-5 ISBN 978-1-349-20157-0 (eBook)
DOI 10.1007/978-1-349-20157-0

Contents

General Introduction	xvii
Introduction: The English Renaissance	xix
Note on Annotation and Glossing	xxvii
Note on Dates	xxvii
KING HENRY VIII	1
Pastime with good company	1
THOMAS WYATT	3
The long love	4
Whoso list to hunt	4
Farewell Love	5
My galley chargèd	5
You that in love	6
Resound my voice	6
They flee from me	7
Like as the swan	8
In eternum	8
What meaneth this?	9
In mourning wise	10
From Satire 1
[Mine own John Poyntz]	12
When first mine eyes	13
HENRY HOWARD (EARL OF SURREY)	14
The soote season	15
Set me where as the sun	15
Love that doth reign	16
From Tuscan came	16
Wyatt resteth here	17
Martial, the things for to attain	18
From Aeneid , Book II	19
QUEEN ELIZABETH I	23
When I was fair and young	23
The Mirror for Magistrates
From 'Richard Earl of Cambridge'	24

ARTHUR GOLDING	27
From Metamorphoses
[Pyramus and Thisbe]	27
GEORGE GASCOIGNE	32
From A Hundred Sundry Flowers
Of all the birds	33
If any flower	34
From A Discourse of the Adventures
Passed by Master F.J.	35
NICHOLAS BRETON	40
Shall we go dance the hay	40
EDMUND SPENSER	41
From The Fairy Queen
[The Bower of Bliss]	42
[The Garden of Adonis]	54
From Amoretti
One day I wrote her name	61
Epithalamion	61
SIR WALTER RALEGH	75
A farewell to false Love	76
A vision upon this conceit of The Fairy
Queen	77
The nymph's reply to the shepherd	77
To Queen Elizabeth	78
As you came from the Holy Land	79
Sir Walter Raleigh to his son	80
Even such is Time	81
From The Discovery of Guiana
[El Dorado]	81
[Lagartos]	82
From The History of the World
[History and Death]	82
Letter to Sir Robert Cecil	85
RICHARD HOOKER	86
From Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity
From Preface	87
JOHN LYL	90
From Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit
[A Cooling Card for Philautus]	90

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY	92
From An Apology for Poetry
[The Golden World of Poetry]	93
From Astrophel and Stella
Loving in truth	95
Not at first sight	96
With how sad steps	96
Come sleep o sleep	97
Because I breathe	97
Who will in	98
I never drank	98
Sweet kiss	99
From Certain Sonnets
Leave me o love	99
From The Countess of Pembroke's
Arcadia
[A skirmish]	100
SIR FULKE GREVILLE	103
From Caelica
Love, the delight	103
Under a throne	104
Farewell sweet boy	104
An Epitaph upon the Right Honourable
Sir Philip Sidney	105
From Life of Sir Philip Sidney
[The character of Sidney]	106
LANCELOT ANDREWES	108
From Sermon 15, 'Of the Nativity'
[On Matthew 2.2]	108
GEORGE PEELE	111
What thing is love?	111
CHIDIOCK TICHBORNE	112
Tichborne's Elegy	112
Hendecasyllabon	113
THOMAS LODGE	114
Love in my bosom	114
Pluck the fruit	115
ROBERT GREENE	117
From Menaphon
Weep not my wanton	117

GEORGE CHAPMAN	119
From Odyssey
[The Blinding of Polyphemus]	119
FRANCIS BACON	122
From The Essays
Of Death	122
Of Love	124
SAMUEL DANIEL	127
From Delia
My spotless love	127
MICHAEL DRAYTON	128
To the Virginian Voyage	128
CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE	131
From Tamburlaine the Great
Part One, Act V, Scene i	132
From Edward II
Act I, Scene i	133
From Doctor Faustus
Act II, Scene i	134
Act V, Scene i	139
Act V, Scene ii	142
From The Jew of Malta
Act IV, Scene i	144
From Hero and Leander
Sestiad Two	146
The Passionate Shepherd to His Love	149
From Ovid's Elegies
Book I, Elegy 5	150
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE	152
From Richard III
Act I, Scene i	152
Romeo and Juliet
Act I, Scene iv	154
The Taming of the Shrew
Act V, Scene ii	155
A Midsummer Night's Dream
Act V, Scene i	156
Richard II
Act II, Scene i	157
The Merchant of Venice
Act IV, Scene i	158

Henry IV Part One
Act III, Scene i	159
Henry IV Part Two
Act IV, Scene iii	161
Much Ado about Nothing
Act II, Scene iii	162
Henry V
Act IV, Scene iii	163
Julius Caesar
Act III, Scene ii	164
As You Like It
Act II, Scene vii	165
Twelfth Night
Act II, Scene iii	166
Hamlet
Act III, Scene i	167
Othello
Act IV, Scene iii	168
King Lear
Act I, Scene i	169
Macbeth
Act II, Scene i	179
Antony and Cleopatra
Act II, Scene ii	180
Coriolanus
Act II, Scene iii	182
The Winter's Tale
Act IV, Scene iii	183
The Tempest
Act V, Scene i	184
From Sonnets
Shall I compare thee	185
When to the sessions	185
That time of year	186
Let me not	186
Th'expense of spirit	187
My mistress' eyes	187
KING JAMES	188
From A Counterblast to Tobacco
[The History of Tobacco]	188
[The Filthy Habit]	189

THOMAS NASHE	192
Songs from Summer's Last Will and Testament
Spring	192
Autumn	193
Adieu, farewell earth's bliss	193
From The Unfortunate Traveller
[The Battle of Marignano]	195
From Christ's Tears over Jerusalem
Ladies of the Court	195
THOMAS CAMPION	198
Follow your saint	198
Rose-cheeked Laura	199
Now winter nights	199
BEN JONSON	201
On my First Son	202
Inviting a Friend to Supper	202
To Penshurst	204
Epitaph on S.P.	207
Epitaph on Elizabeth	208
Song. To Celia	208
To the Memory of my Belovèd, the Author Mr William Shakespeare	209
From Timber: or Discoveries
[On Shakespeare]	211
From Volpone
Act III, Scene vii	212
From The Alchemist
Act IV, Scene vii	215
From Bartholomew Fair
Induction	218
JOHN DONNE	220
From Songs and Sonnets
Air and Angels	221
The Bait	221
The Canonization	223
The Flea	224
The Good Morrow	225
A Lecture upon the Shadow	226
The Relic	227

Song (Go and catch)	228
The Sun Rising	229
A Valediction: forbidding Mourning	230
Woman's Constancy	231
From Holy Sonnets
Death be not proud	232
Batter my heart	232
Oh, to vex me	233
From Elegies
The Dream	233
From Satires
Away thou fondling	234
From Paradoxes
A Defence of Women's Inconstancy	238
From Devotions
Meditation [For Whom the Bell Tolls]	240
From A Sermon Preached at Whitehall	241
RICHARD BARNFIELD	242
From The Affectionate Shepherd
The Tears of an Affectionate Shepherd Sick for Love	242
From Cynthia
The Stoics think	243
Sometimes I wish	243
Cherry-lipped Adonis	244
CYRIL TOURNEUR	245
From The Revenger's Tragedy
Act III, Scene v	245
JOHN FLETCHER and FRANCIS BEAUMONT	248
From The Maid's Tragedy
Act II, Scene i	248
THOMAS MIDDLETON	251
From Blurt, Master Constable
Midnight's bell	251
JOHN WEBSTER	252
From The White Devil
The Arraignment of Vittoria	252
From The Duchess of Malfi
Act IV, Scene ii	256

From The Devil's Law-Case
Act V, Scene iv	259
WILLIAM DRUMMOND	261
Sleep, silence child	261
Alexis, here she stayed	262
For the Baptist	262
Madrigal: 'On this cold world'	263
From A Cypress Grove
[On Death]	264
THOMAS HOBBS	266
From Leviathan
Of the Natural Condition of Mankind	267
ROBERT HERRICK	270
Corinna's Gone a-Maying	271
His Prayer to Ben Jonson	273
To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time	274
Poems to Julia
Her Bed	274
Her Legs	274
Upon Julia's Clothes	275
Upon Julia's Breasts	275
Upon Julia's Voice	275
Upon Mrs Susanna Southwell, Her Feet	275
To Anthea, Who May Command Him
Anything	276
His Litany to the Holy Spirit	277
This crosstree here	279
HENRY KING	280
From An Exequy	280
FRANCIS QUARLES	282
From Emblems
False world thou liest	282
GEORGE HERBERT	284
From The Temple
The Altar	285
Easter-Wings	285
Sin	286
Prayer	287
Jordan (I)	287

Unkindness	288
Jordan (II)	289
The Collar	289
The Pulley	290
The Flower	291
The Twenty-Third Psalm	292
Discipline	293
Love	294
From A Priest to the Temple
'The Parson's Life'	295
Letter 'For my dear sick sister'	296
IZAAK WALTON	297
From The Complete Angler
The Epistle to the Reader	297
From The Life of Mr George Herbert
[The Death of Herbert]	300
From The Life of Dr John Donne
[The Youth of Donne]	301
THOMAS CAREW	304
Ask me no more	304
SIR THOMAS BROWNE	306
From Religio Medici
The First Part	306
The Second Part	309
EDMUND WALLER	311
Of English Verse	311
Go Lovely Rose	312
JOHN MILTON	314
Sonnet 1 O nightingale	315
From 'On the Morning of Christ's
Nativity'	315
On Shakespeare	316
On the University Carrier	317
Sonnet 7: How soon hath time	317
Song from Arcades	318
On Time	318
From Comus	319
Lycidas	322
From Reason of Church Government
[Milton's Vocation as a Poet]	327

From Areopagitica
[On Liberty]	333
Sonnet 16 When I consider	338
Sonnet 19 Methought I saw	338
From Paradise Lost
Book I, 1–26	339
Book IV, 610–56	340
Book XII, 624–49	341
From Paradise Regained
Book III, 43–107	342
From Samson Agonistes
The Scene before the Prison in Gaza	344
SIR JOHN SUCKLING	347
Song: Why so pale and wan	347
RICHARD CRASHAW	348
A Hymn of the Nativity, sung as by the Shepherds	348
The Tear	352
On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord	354
On Marriage	354
RICHARD LOVELACE	355
To Althea, From Prison	355
To Lucasta, Going to the Wars	356
ABRAHAM COWLEY	357
Anacreontic on Drinking	357
LUCY HUTCHINSON	359
From Life of Colonel Hutchinson [On England]	359
ANDREW MARVELL	363
The Definition of Love	363
To His Coy Mistress	365
An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland	366
The Garden	370
On a Drop of Dew	372
The Mower to the Glowworms	373
Bermudas	374
An Epitaph Upon –	375
HENRY VAUGHAN	376
The Retreat	376

Peace	377
Man	378
They are all gone into the world of light!	379
The Night	380
MARGARET CAVENDISH	382
To All Writing Ladies	382
THOMAS TRAHERNE	384
Wonder	384
From Centuries of Meditations [A Vision of Heaven]	386
BALLADS	387
Dives and Lazarus	388
Little Musgrave and Lady Barnard	390
Robin Hood and Little John	393
CHARACTERS	399
Fuller on Bacon	399
Clarendon on Jonson	400
Clarendon on Cromwell	400
Baxter on Fairfax	401
THE ENGLISH BIBLE	402
The Twenty-Third Psalm	402
Authorised Version	402
Sternhold and Hopkins	403
Geneva Bible	403
Bishops' Bible	403
Douai Bible	403
Further Reading	404
Index of First Lines	406
Index of Authors	411
Source List	413

General Introduction

There can often be a gulf between the restricted reading required by a school, college or university syllabus and the great expanse of English literature which is there to be explored and enjoyed. There are two effective ways of bridging that gulf. One is to be aware of how authors relate or have related to their contemporary situations and their contemporaries, how they accept, develop or react against what has been written by their predecessors or older contemporaries, how, in short, they fit into the long history of English literature. Good histories of literature – and there is a welcome increase of interest in them – serve to place authors in their context, as well as giving a panoptic view of their careers.

The second way is to sample their work, to discover the kind or kinds of writing they have produced. Here is where the anthology contributes to an enjoyment of reading. It conveys the flavour of an author as nothing but reading that author can. And when an author is compared to his or her fellow writers – a thing a good anthology facilitates – the reader gains several extra dimensions, not least an insight into what thoughts, what fears, what delights have occupied writers at different times. To gain such insights is to see, among other things, the relevance of past authors to the present, to the reader. Reading an anthology shows something of the vast range of our literature, its variety of form and outlook, of mood and expression, from black despair to ecstatic happiness; it is an expansive experience widening our horizons, enhancing specialised study, but also conveying its own particular pleasures, the joy of finding familiar pieces among unfamiliar, of reacting to fresh stimuli, of reaching new conclusions about authors, in short, of making literature a part of oneself.

Anthologies also play a part in the life of a literature. If we are the beneficiaries of our literary inheritance, we are also trustees for it, and the maintenance of the inheritance for future generations requires new selections of properly edited texts. The Macmillan Literary Anthologies, which have followed on from the Macmillan Histories of Literature, are designed to present these texts with the essential pertinent information. The selection made of poetry, prose and plays has been wide and inclusive, authors appear in the order of their dates of birth, texts – with the exception of the Middle English section – are largely modernised and footnotes are kept to a minimum. A broadly representative policy has been the aim of the general editors, who have maintained a similar format and proportion in each volume, though the medieval volume has required more annotation.

ANJ MJA

Introduction:

The English Renaissance

The period of English literature covered by this volume is known to students of literature as the Renaissance, and to students of history as the Early Modern period. These phrases are not merely descriptive, for each term represents an ideological construction of the past. The idea of a renaissance, or rebirth, implies a preceding period of decadence, a period which separates the time of renewal from the exemplary values and achievements of a still earlier period. According to this model, which was invented by the humanist writers of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, the exemplary period was that of classical antiquity, the civilisations of ancient Greece and Rome. The period of decadence was the Middle Ages, which was seen as a time in which the values of antiquity were corrupted. The Renaissance, however, was regarded as a time when the decadence of the Middle Ages was rejected in favour of a revival of the ideals of the ancient world. The upheaval of the Reformation created an ecclesiastical model parallel to the cultural notion of the Renaissance, for the new Protestant church was seen as recovering the purity of the early church from the corruption and superstition of the Middle Ages. The historians' term 'Early Modern' is an attempt to avoid the cultural bias of the term 'Renaissance', but is nonetheless built on the idea of a medieval period followed by a modern period, in the early stages of which are to be found the roots of the present.

The notion of a medieval period of darkness and ignorance stretching from the fall of Rome (or, in the ecclesiastical model, from the official adoption of Christianity as the state religion in the fourth century) to the sixteenth century will seem ridiculous to anyone familiar with the accomplishments of medieval literature, or to anyone who has visited the magnificent cathedrals of the period. The idea of a Renaissance which supersedes the accomplishments of a millenium may seem untenable to the twentieth-century student of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century literature, but because the model was taken seriously at the time, the modern student of Renaissance literature must take it seriously. According to this model the history of English (and European) culture may be traced to ancient Rome and thence to its roots in ancient Greece, rather than to our barbarian ancestors. The consequences of this view of our cultural history are not only reflected in the literature included in this volume, but continue to be felt in English education up to the present time. The ancient language which has traditionally been taught in English schools is not the Old English of our ancestors but rather the Latin of ancient Rome and the Greek of ancient Athens. The humanists of the Renaissance championed the fiction of a cultural past which linked us to two remote Mediterranean countries and ignored the continuity of English cultural history.

This theory of cultural descent was sufficiently powerful to create a literature which reflected its tenets, and in due course theory became fact, for Renaissance literature increasingly came to be based on classical rather than English models. The plays of Shakespeare and his contemporaries, for example, owe comparatively little to the lively tradition of English medieval drama. Instead they are constructed on the model of the five-act play, a form borrowed from the plays of ancient Rome. Similarly, the fact that many Renaissance plays are described on their title-pages as comedies or tragedies testifies to the power of these ancient categories to shape the controlling ideas of the drama of the period. The influence of Roman plays even extends to the values celebrated in Renaissance drama. When Romeo and Juliet commit suicide at the end of Shakespeare's tragedy, for example, the audience did not assume that the lovers had committed a sin which condemned them to eternal torment, despite the fact that the Elizabethan church condemned suicide in these terms; in Shakespearean tragedy the audience is invited to see suicide as a noble act, and this attitude derives from the values of ancient Rome rather than those of Elizabethan England.

The self-conscious influence of the literature and values of the ancient world can be felt throughout the literature of the English Renaissance. The pervasive mythological imagery of the period, for example, is not drawn from the ancient religions of England, but rather from the religions of ancient Greece and Rome. This classical mythology was so powerful a resource for Renaissance writers that it was often used as a code for speaking about the Christian faith. The 'all-judging Jove' of Milton's Lycidas, for example, is a thinly disguised all-judging Jehovah. Similarly, the writers of the Renaissance often chose to cast their works in forms borrowed from classical literature. It would not have been surprising if English Renaissance literature had been largely written in Latin that ancient forms such as epic, pastoral and satire would have been adopted; what is remarkable is that a vernacular language, in this case English, should be turned to the service of these forms. Education in this period, both in the schools and in the universities, was conducted wholly through the medium of Latin. The writers which this educational system produced retained the ancient forms with which they were so familiar, but used them as vessels in which to establish English as a literary language capable of supporting a literature as great as the literature of Greece and Rome. This sense of the competition between English literature and the literature of the ancient world accounts in large measure for the classical texture of so much English Renaissance literature.

The appropriation of an ancient and remote literary tradition as the basis of a new national literature does not of course produce a replica of that ancient literature. Once a literature is freed from the constraints of a classical language, it gradually moves away from its classical base. In drama, for example, early tragedies such as Kyd's Spanish Tragedy are markedly Senecan in tone and effect. As English tragedy developed from its neo-classical beginnings, however, it gradually evolved into a form that was only vestigially classical. Characters slowly became more introspective than their counterparts in classical plays; there is, for example, no character as self-questioning as Hamlet in ancient drama. Similarly, the classical ghosts which thump across the stages of early Renaissance plays increasingly become a psychological rather than a physical presence on the stage, and the notion of tragedy involving the demise of a single character slowly evolves into the pervasive corruption of tragedies of late Renaissance dramatists such as Webster.

Renaissance writers turned the vernacular languages to the service of classical forms, but it was of course impossible to ignore the indigenous literary traditions which were already built into those languages. Ironically, it was the common Latin culture of Renaissance Europe which fostered a mutual awareness of the establishment of various vernacular literatures. For English writers the central model was often the literature of Italy, though Italian influences were often mediated through France and the Low Countries, and arrived in England wholly transformed. The gap between the precepts of Machiavelli and the figure of Machiavel on the English stage, for example, can in some measure be explained by reference to the popular image of Machiavelli in France. Of the great Italian writers, Dante had surprisingly little influence on the literature of the English Renaissance. The fountainhead of European and English literature of the Renaissance was not Dante, but Petrarch, for it was Petrarch and his successors who established the language of love which was inherited by the Renaissance, and which sharply distinguishes the love poetry of the Renaissance from its counterparts in the ancient world. Indeed, it could be argued that Petrarch was responsible for the idea of romantic love which was celebrated in Renaissance poetry and has become an integral part of the western cultural tradition. An emotion which began as a literary attitude in Petrarchan poetry has become a real emotion in modern western culture; in the western world people now fall in love, and marry for love, and this convention separates us from cultures which have not been influenced by this tradition, and therefore encourage marriage by arrangement.

The central theme of English Renaissance literature is love, but that emotion is neither the literary attitude of the Petrarchans nor the emotion which modern students of Renaissance literature may experience in their private lives and may therefore be tempted to impose on Renaissance literature. This literature is not receptive to such an imposition, because it is poised on the point at which poets were struggling to reconcile the artificial Petrarchan language of love which they had inherited with the real erotic impulses which prompted their poetry. The love celebrated in the sonnets and comedies of the period has its origins in a Petrarchan tradition which in turn derived from the courtly poetry of Provence and the literary traditions of the twelfth-century Renaissance in France. From the cult of the Virgin Mary the Petrarchans adopted the veneration of the lady as a figure of spotless purity and virtue; from the neo-Platonic tradition they adopted the idea of love as an ennobling emotion which raised the mind above mere physical attraction. In the closing years of the sixteenth century a third influence, that of Ovidian eroticism, began to colour the literature of love, and poets such as Sir Philip Sidney began to describe their love in frankly voluptuous conceits. In poets such as John Donne this erotic strain co-exists with the tradition of idealising the woman. In the comedies of the English Renaissance love is an emotion (like tragic emotion) experienced only by the upper classes; this convention reflects the origins of romantic love in the courtly love of the Petrarchans. When working-class characters such as shepherds fall in love in English comedies, their emotions are an object of mirth. When love appears in the tragedies of the period, it becomes a destructive force, just as it had been in the tragedies of classical antiquity. In Shakespeare's tragedies hardened generals such as Othello and Antony are destroyed by the intensity of their love. In Milton's Paradise Lost, an epic in which the fall of humankind is presented as a tragedy, the fall of Adam is occasioned by his excessive love of Eve.

The discrepancy between the presentation of love in Renaissance literature and the modern sense of the nature of that emotion is a useful reminder of the gap in values which must be overcome if that literature is properly to be understood. The same may be said of the chief characteristic of Renaissance literature, that of decorum. In the twentieth century we are inclined to value sincerity and naturalness, but these are not values which are celebrated in Renaissance literature. Pastoral poems, in which the poet pretends to be a shepherd, seem to the modern reader artificial. In 'The Passionate Shepherd to his Love', for example, Marlowe speaks with a voice so innocent that we have difficulty reconciling it with the voice of Marlowe the radical playwright. But decorum demands that the voice of the pastoral poet be pure and guileless, and that his love reflect the values of a golden age of eternal summer in which shepherds are freed from the tending of sheep in order to concentrate on the composition of love-songs. Part of the genius of Marlowe's poem is his ability to extirpate utterly the sordidness of the world in which he lived, and instead to present himself as the purest of lovers. The 'Passionate Shepherd' is not extending an invitation to cohabit outside the confines of marriage, but rather to enter into a world in which love is uncontaminated by any worldly or moral concerns.

Similar notions of decorum also govern the comedies and tragedies of the period. Shakespeare's comedies, for example, are not naturalistic and psychologically-plausible accounts of courtship, but rather dramatic expositions of the notion that love can conquer all obstacles. The values which they celebrate are not our values, nor are they necessarily Shakespeare's values: they are the values of the genre, in this case comedy. In the comic view of the world, the most vital characters are female, and Shakespeare's comedies accordingly have at their centres heroines whose intelligence and vitality is unmatched by the comparatively dim-witted men with whom they are paired at the end of each play. The fact that women dominate these plays, and that the plays celebrate female values, does not make Shakespeare a feminist, but simply a writer of dramatic comedy. When he turns to tragedy his apparent values shift to meet the constraints of decorum in that genre. Tragedy is a male genre; except in the case of tragedies of love, in which a woman must of necessity assume a crucial part, tragedies are dominated by male characters. They also celebrate male values such as strength of character and soundness of judgement; tragic heroes who fail to live up to these standards inevitably fall. The demands of decorum could make Marlowe and Shakespeare celebrants of love when they were writing pastoral or comedy, and exponents of masculine military virtues when they were writing tragedy.

For many modern readers the aspect of Renaissance literature which alienates more than any other is the pervasive presence of religion. In the case of allusions to the gods of ancient Greece and Rome, the twentieth-century reader is likely to be merely puzzled, but such puzzles can usually be resolved by reference to the explanatory footnotes which gloss such references in volumes like this one. Allusions to Christianity constitute a more difficult problem, for the modern secular reader is tempted to see Renaissance literature as representative of our superstitious past, and the modern religious reader is likely to think many of the Christian allusions blasphemous. In Donne's sonnet 'Batter my heart', for example, the poet assumes the voice of a Petrarchan lady, God is described as a male Petrarchan lover, and Satan is portrayed as the despised other man in an adulterous Petrarchan triangle. The poem ends with a plea on the part of the lady to be ravished by God. Such an analogy, though common in early literature, would no longer be considered in many Christian circles as an appropriate way of describing the nature of the relationship between a believer and her god. What must be appreciated is that in the early seventeenth century Christians were so soaked in the traditions of neo-platonism that they assumed that the love of man and woman was an earthly reflection of the love of God and his believers for each other. This analogy even extended to the sexual aspect of human love, so that, for example, the ecstasy of joining God in the moment of death is assumed to be analogous to human sexual ecstasy; this analogy often manifests itself in the infamous pun on 'die', which in some contexts refers to both physical death and sexual consummation. Such analogies now seem strange and strained, but it must be appreciated that they permeate Renaissance literature. In Ben Jonson's poem on the death of his first son, Jonson proposes an analogy between the creation of a child and the creation of a poem. Again, the analogy may seem to the modern reader to skate on the edge of blasphemy, but to Renaissance poets such analogies were commonplace; they inhabited a world which was deemed in all respects to reflect the divine order of things.

The preoccupation with analogies between earthly affairs and God's relationship to his creation is a marked characteristic of the religious writing of the period. The other striking feature is a preoccupation with death which may seem to the modern reader excessively morbid. Daily life, however, was more often marred by death than is the case now. Pregnancy was often a death sentence for the mother, and most infants died young. The plague regularly cut swathes through the population; violent deaths and public judicial executions were commonplace. It is now possible for an individual to live for many years without experiencing the death of a close contemporary or a member of his family; such was not the case in the Renaissance, and the regular encounters with death which were a common feature of life encouraged a more pressing awareness of mortality than is now the case. This awareness manifested itself not only in memorial poems, but also in literature not directly concerned with death. Shakespeare's sonnets, or Raleigh's lyrics, for example, are often preoccupied with the classical notion of time as a force which devours beauty and life itself. Many lyrics of the period expound the theme of carpe diem, a Latin phrase which literally means 'seize the day'. Carpe diem poems encourage the snatching of the pleasures of the moment. Herrick's 'Gather ye rosebuds while ye may' and Marvell's 'To his Coy Mistress' are both centred on the carpe diem motif, as is Feste's 'O mistress mine' in Twelfth Night:

What is love? 'Tis not hereafter;
Present mirth hath present laughter,
What's to come is still unsure.
In delay there lies no plenty –
Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty,
Youth's a stuff will not endure.

The notion that love can offer solace in the face of the uncertainties of life is a central concern of Renaissance literature. Happily it is one of the threads which connects the literature of the Renaissance to our own time. The modern reader of Renaissance literature retains an awareness of the historical distance between our own time and the Renaissance, but the stronger impression is of a continuity which enables us to read and study that literature with an immediacy which affords enormous pleasure.

GC

Note on Annotation and Glossing

An asterisk * at the end of a word indicates that such words are glossed in the margin.

A dagger † at the end of a word or phrase indicates that the word or phrase is annotated, or given a longer gloss, at the foot of the page.

Note on Dates

Where dates appear at the end of extracts, that on the left denotes the date of composition, that on the right, the date of publication.