Acknowledgements

My interest in some of the materials developed here was first raised within the University of Nottingham Critical Theory Group. I would like to thank friends and colleagues within that group who offered helpful comments on individual sections of my manuscript: most especially – Elizabeth Boa, Diane Knight, Elaine Millard, and Douglas Tallack. I tested out some of the critical approaches represented here with my students. My thanks for their patience, cooperation, and ideas. Gavin Cologne-Brookes, working under my supervision toward his Ph.D. on William Styron's novels, discussed Bakhtin with me at length. I hope our conversations were as useful to him as they were to me.

My special thanks to two colleagues from my department whose help has been even more substantial. Richard King was ever-willing to read chapters and part-chapters for me in draft form. His good advice and warm encouragement were invaluable. So, too, were David Murray's. He read both separate sections of the book as I was proceeding, then the complete text at manuscript stage, and his comments were always incisive, always constructive. I consider myself privileged to have such colleagues and friends. With the help of all those named above, this book is much better than it would otherwise have been.

I also wish to thank Caroline Egar and Moira Eminton for the concern and care which she brought to this project; and Freda Duckitt, our departmental secretary, whose speed and accuracy in typing the book, despite other tasks at hand, was greatly appreciated. John Clements, the best of friends, provided the basketball, bourbon and good talk which gave much needed temporary relief in the throes of writing. William and Alice, my children, always special, showed real interest in what I was doing; both encouraged me and put up without complaint as I retreated yet again to work on this manuscript. My love to them. And also, of course, to Penny Craig to whom I owe a thousand thanks.
