I first studied nationalism as an undergraduate student of Joseph Frankel at the University of Aberdeen in 1957–58, and later specialised in the study of Scottish politics as a university lecturer. Once more, the subject of nationalism came to the fore, in the form of Scottish nationalism. As a Visiting Professor of Political Science at the University of Pittsburgh in 1985–86, I taught a course on nationalism generally, and had regular discussions on the subject with Richard Cottam (an expert on Middle East nationalism), Dennison Rusinow (an historian with a particular interest in Balkan nationalism), and Christina Paulston (a linguist specialising in language survival). These sessions broadened my perspective considerably.

At the University of Glasgow, I have kept up a continuous discourse on nationalism with colleagues, many of whom are experts on political theory and the study of particular areas of the world. Most of these will perhaps be surprised at the content of this book, and perhaps alarmed. I hope they do not mind my thanking them here, but they are of course not a party to what I have written.

Special thanks are due to Mrs Avril Johnstone, who coped with the frequent revisions during the production of the typescript.
