Acknowledgements

In writing this book, I have profited from conversations with many colleagues, friends and students, but I would like to give special mention to Professor Elizabeth D. Harvey, for her many insights on feminist theory; to Dr Judith Williams, for her astute editorial eye; and to Elisabeth MacDonald, for her tireless footwork in the library. My particular thanks also go to Professor Richard Hillman, whose professional advice, emotional support and culinary genius sustained me at every point.

A longer version of the section on Romola appeared as 'Gender and History in George Eliot's Romola' in the Dalhousie Review (67 [1987]: 257–74); I am grateful to the editor for permission to reprint it.

Editors' Preface

The study of women's writing has been long neglected by a male critical establishment both in academic circles and beyond. As a result, many women writers have either been unfairly neglected or have been marginalised in some way, so that their true influence and importance has been ignored. Other women writers have been accepted by male critics and academics, but on terms which seem, to many women readers of this generation, to be false or simplistic. In the past the internal conflicts involved in being a woman in a male-dominated society have been largely ignored by readers of both sexes, and this has affected our reading of women's work. The time has come for a serious reassessment of women's writing in the light of what we understand today.

This series is designed to help in that reassessment.

All the books are written by women because we believe that men's understanding of feminist critique is only, at best, partial. And besides, men have held the floor quite long enough.
