Acknowledgements

We wish to thank all colleagues in the Department of English Studies at the University of Nottingham, Derby Tertiary College, Wilmorton and Derby Tertiary College, Mackworth who have helped this book to see the light of day. We would particularly like to thank Margaret Berry, Walter Nash and Doris Crick whose examples of scholarly and critical thoroughness have assisted us in our study of the links between language, literature and rhetoric. Professor Alan Sommerstein of the Department of Classics and Dr Peter Boyle of the Department of American Studies at the University of Nottingham are also owed our gratitude for contributions from their particular expertise, as is Professor John Hampton of the Department of Medicine for his happy suggestion of a title, and Natasha Bourne for allowing us to profit from her shrewd analysis of Prime Ministerial rhetoric. We must also thank our friends and family for their encouragement and support over an unconscionably long gestation.

In addition, with our publishers we thank the following for permission to reproduce material: Cambridge University Press and Gordon Wells for a diagram from Learning through Interaction edited by Gordon Wells; Curtis Brown Ltd and the Estate of Sir Winston Churchill for permission to quote from his speeches; Faber and Faber for poems by Philip Larkin ('A Study of Reading Habits') and Sylvia Plath ('Metaphors'); and Penguin Books for extracts from A. N. W. Saunders's translation of Demosthenes. We also gratefully acknowledge permission from K.H.B.B. Advertising Agency and from Toshiba Corporation, Europe, to reproduce the text of advertisements (for the Saab Carlsson CD and the Toshiba 'First Family of Portables', respectively).
