

ISSUES IN POLITICAL THEORY

Political Theory has undergone a remarkable development in recent years. From a state in which it was once declared dead, it has come to occupy a central place in the study of Politics. Both political ideas and the wide-ranging arguments to which they give rise are now treated in a rigorous, analytical fashion, and political theorists have contributed to disciplines as diverse as economics, sociology and law. These developments have made the subject more challenging and exciting, but they have also added to the difficulties of students and others coming to the subject for the first time. Much of the burgeoning literature in specialist books and journals is readily intelligible only to those who are already well-versed in the subject.

Issues in Political Theory is a series conceived in response to this situation. It consists of a number of detailed and comprehensive studies of issues central to Political Theory which take account of the latest developments in scholarly debate. While making original contributions to the subject, books in the series are written especially for those who are new to Political Theory. Each volume aims to introduce its readers to the intricacies of a fundamental political issue and to help them find their way through the detailed, and often complicated, argument that that issue has attracted.

I have acquired many debts in writing this book. I owe a great deal to my colleague, Albert Weale, both for his very valuable and helpful advice on the text of this book and for the encouragement and intellectual stimulus he has given me over very many years. Steven Kennedy has been immensely helpful as publisher of this book. I am indebted to him for his advice and for the patience and good humour with which he has tolerated my repeated delays in completing this project.

My colleagues, Simon Caney and Tim Gray, spent many hours carefully scrutinising an early draft of the text. They have saved me from many errors and suggested a great many improvements and the final product is very much better for their efforts. I am also grateful for their support and encouragement to several other of my colleagues at Newcastle, particularly to Hugh Berrington.

Some of the arguments in Chapter 7 were first developed in a paper I wrote for an ECPR Workshop on Needs and Welfare organised by Robert Goodin and Alan Ware; I am grateful to them and to the other members of the Workshop for their helpful comments on those arguments.

I claim the author's customary right to whatever errors and misjudgements remain, particularly since I have sometimes resisted the good advice that I have received.

Finally I must express my thanks to my wife, to whom this book is dedicated, and to my children, Adam and Rachel. For a long time they have seen me retreat to my study when I might have spent my time with them. In spite of the neglect that they have suffered while I have been writing this book, they have constantly given me their support and have shown a tolerance of my academic preoccupations to which I certainly had no right. I count myself very lucky. I know they are as pleased as I am to see my word-processor at last give birth to this book.
