PREFACE

More colleagues, friends and students than I can name here have helped in the making of this book. Cliff Davies and John Watts read drafts of all of it, and I owe a great deal to their comments and to discussions of its themes with each of them over a number of years. Steven Ellis, Gerald Harriss, Eric Ives and Simon Payling read and commented upon individual chapters, and I have many others to thank for stimulating conversation about aspects of the subject at various times, most notably George Bernard and Richard Hoyle. My students at the universities of Newcastle and Oxford, especially those from Merton and St Peter's Colleges, have contributed by the ideas in their essays, their arguments in tutorial, and their preparedness to look profoundly unconvinced when I have tried out some wayward notion on them. My historical colleagues at Merton, Robert Gildea, Roger Highfield, Richard John, Matthew Kempshall, John Roberts, Philip Waller and the late Ralph Davis, have encouraged and inspired me even when their research interests were far from my own. Jeremy Black as series editor and Vanessa Graham at Macmillan have been helpful and understanding. So have the staffs of the libraries and archives in which I have worked, and those who have allowed me to cite their unpublished theses or forthcoming work, Peter Cunich, Ronald Fritze, Dominic Lockett, and Susan Vokes. My parents, to whom my first book was dedicated, have been as encouraging in this venture as they were in that; so, in her own way, has my daughter, whose turn for a dedication will, I trust, come in time. But this book is dedicated to my wife, in gratitude for all her cheerful encouragement and loving support.
