ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book owes its first debt to the University of Strathclyde's generosity in granting leave for its completion, among that of other projects, in the second semester of the 1996/7 session. Its genesis is of considerably longer standing: indeed, it could not have been written, nor would I have entered upon Jacobite studies, without the dynamic environment created in eighteenth-century historiography by scholars such as Eveline Cruickshanks, Jeremy Black, Frank McLynn and Daniel Szechi, whose findings, whether one agrees or disagrees with them, have made it impossible to avoid the subject of Jacobitism in this period. I am here indebted not only to their research, but also to the many conversations I have had with them and other scholars, not least Bruce Lenman, whose assessment of Jacobitism's importance is nicely balanced with his scepticism concerning the virtues of the dynasty which gave rise to it. In addition, I have benefited (as always) considerably from many years of debate and discussion with Ross Mackenzie, Property Manager at Culloden Battlefield, and the understanding I have gained of Jacobitism's historic importance to groups in Scottish society, in part at least through his good offices. There are, of course, many other approaches to the study of eighteenth-century history, and I am fortunate to have been able to keep abreast of these both through the company of distinguished colleagues at the University of Edinburgh (particularly Harry Dickinson) and now at the Research Centre for Scottish History at Strathclyde.

Thanks are, as always, due to my wife Anne, for her readiness to discuss a subject so long inflicted on the household, and to my daughters Vinnie and Lexie, whose vision of Charles Edward Stuart has been animated by David Niven's 1948 portrayal. I trust that Jacobitism has reached a stage in its study where it will no longer fade into the mist, though any inaccuracies in bringing it here into the light of day are my own. Dates used are Old Style except where otherwise indicated.
