ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

A work of synthesis such as this inevitably rests heavily on the work of other scholars. I hope such debts are adequately acknowledged in the notes and in the bibliographical essay. However, I wish to make additional remarks on the contribution of a number of close academic friends and colleagues. I am deeply grateful to Colin Holmes and David Martin, who read and commented on the entire typescript. Enda Delaney, Sheridan Gilley, Tony Hepburn, Frank Neal, Alan O'Day and Roger Swift each helped to improve individual chapters. Thanks also to my colleagues Sylvia Ellis, Matt Perry and Peter Waldron for their encouragement during the writing of this book. I owe a significant debt to my special subject students of 1994–5 and 1997–8, who sharpened my thinking on the Irish in Britain. As this book was written without any period of study leave, and with the usual burden of teaching and administration, it is more important than usual to acknowledge the love and support of my wife and son, Lisa and Michael. All those evenings and weekends should have been theirs; but any errors are mine.
