Acknowledgements

I would like to thank my colleagues at Huddersfield University for enabling me to have a sabbatical semester to work on this book and for helpful feedback in the Politics Research Seminars. Special thanks to members of the Gender Research Group, to Andrew Taylor, Bill Stafford and Steve Brown for comments on early drafts of some sections, and to Peter Gurney for curbing my metaphors when they galloped out of control. Thanks too to many of the students in my Women, Politics and Society module for their hard work and enthusiasm.

Very special thanks are due to Ruth Lister and Elizabeth Meehan for their constructive comments on the draft manuscript, and to my editor, Jo Campling, for her confident support and patience when I needed to extend my deadlines. Thank you to Penny Noel for advice and references for Chapter 6, to Fran Thurling for the suggestion at the beginning of Chapter 9 and to Ben Enticknap for proof-reading much of the final draft.

Thanks to my friends, without whose practical, emotional and intellectual support this book could not have been written.

And thanks to Patrick and Lucy Bryson for keeping me in touch with reality.

A note on terminology

My use of the term race throughout this book refers to socially created identities and structures, not to biological categories. I have decided against putting the word into inverted commas to make this clear, because singling out this one term would seem to pre-judge feminist debates over whether sex and gender are also to be understood in societal rather than biological terms. For a fuller discussion of this, see Chapter 3.
