

DENIAL

The writing of Holocaust and genocide history has no end. New discoveries require new interpretations, and the pursuit of knowledge and truth requires the rewriting of history. Not all rewriting, however, serves good ends. Rewriting can undermine knowledge; it can deny what is true. By focusing on denial, the articles that conclude this history volume are a warning. As they expose 'revision' that threatens accurate memory of the Holocaust and genocide, they reaffirm that historical research must be as penetrating and persistent as it is governed by the highest standards of scholarship.

Perspectives from a British Courtroom:
My Struggle with Deception, Lies and David Irving
Deborah Lipstadt
(Plenary Address)
769

Historians and Holocaust Denial in the Courtroom
Christopher Browning
(Plenary Address)
773

America, the Holocaust, and the Experience of Radical Evil
David H. Hirsch
779

Denial: The Armenian Genocide as a Prototype
Richard G. Hovannisian
796

Revisionism in Post-Communist Romanian Political Culture:
The Attempts to Rehabilitate the Perpetrators of the Holocaust
Radu Ioanid
813

Legal Constraints on the New Anti-Semitism: The Canadian Experience
Thomas S. Kuttner
832

Disinformation and Antisemitism:
Holocaust Denial in the Baltic States, 1945–1999
Dov Levin
847

A Past That Must Not Go Away: Holocaust Denial in South Africa
Milton Shain and Andrew Lamprecht
858

Holocaust Denial: The Spectre of Irrationalism at the Millennium
Shelly Z. Shapiro and Susan Lee Pentlin
870

'Aryans' and 'Khazars': Anti-Semitic Propaganda in Contemporary Russia

Victor A. Shnirelman

884

Antisemitic Writings of the Arrow-Cross Emigration

Tamás Stark

897

'The Internet is our Sword': Aspects of Online Antisemitism

Mark Weitzman

911