ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I CANNOT IMAGINE EMBARKING ON THIS PROCESS WITHOUT THE SUPPORT and motivation of Carolyn Dever, whose utterly indispensable criticism has challenged and inspired me, and whose kindness and patience has been a beacon throughout this project. Likewise, I would like to thank Phillip Brian Harper, who was so influential and inspiring throughout my research and who offered me the crucial encouragement to pursue the non-canonical texts that so fascinated me. And I want to thank Lisa Duggan, whose key insights and crucial historian's perspective has tightened and focused this project, and whose encouraging advice guided me.

In addition, I would like to thank Corrine Abate, Sarah Stevenson, Joe Nazare, Ezra Cappell, Kyung-Sook Boo, all of whom were endlessly helpful in workshopping my chapters at New York University.

My parents Philip and Patricia Abbott provided unconditional support, insightful critiques, and, perhaps most important of all, an excitement about my work. Their generosity overwhelms me. Thanks also need to be extended to my brother Josh Abbott and sister-in-law Julie Nichols for their affection and kindness, and to my grandparents, Ralph and Janet Nase, for infusing my years on the East Coast with warmth and tenderness. And, finally, to my dearest friend Christine Biretta, whose long-distance support and generous ear-bending never wavers.

But most of all, I can't fathom completing this project without my husband, Josh. At work on his own book, he kept one maddening chapter ahead of me for twenty-four months. He watched (and continues to watch) all things noir with me, and even more importantly, he understood the pains and pangs of the process, nurturing me along with love and with an expansive generosity of spirit.
