Acknowledgements

When I told one of my interviewees, Jane Wood, about my project, she compared me to an Eagle Scout candidate who had taken on the job of painting a rather long fence. Covering a span of some thirty years in the life of the New Hampshire presidential primary, and in the life of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, has proven to be quite a task. Luckily, I had a lot of people helping me with the paint job, and I would like to thank them now.

First, my research has been greatly assisted by the New Hampshire Institute of Politics at Saint Anselm College, where I am fortunate enough to be a research fellow. The institute has offered both time and funding to me to pursue my research, and both commodities have been invaluable.

Bill Gardner, New Hampshire's secretary of state, and New Hampshire political historian Charles Brereton were very kind to a new kid on the block when I arrived here in 1999. Brereton's book on the presidential primary, First in the Nation, was quite helpful to me then and remained so in this project.

In the course of researching this book, I conducted several dozen interviews with participants in the New Hampshire primary, past and present. Those I interviewed were uniformly generous with their insights and experience. The interviews were an education in themselves, and I hope that I convey some small part of the knowledge I gained from them.

An important part of this book is an investigation into the political demographics of New Hampshire. This would not have been possible without the unflagging assistance of Thomas Duffy (an alumnus of Saint Anselm College) and New Hampshire's Office of State Planning. Martin Capodice also offered valuable advice in studying census data on white-collar and blue-collar workers.

Over the past two summers, student research assistants here at the institute have aided me with my research. Jennifer Durant, Jennifer Doherty, Keith Luter, and Melissa Surawski all worked diligently and skillfully. A special thanks to Mr. Luter and Ms. Surawski for their careful work in deciphering census maps and their aid in creating demographic profiles of New Hampshire's city wards. Lindsay Hanson and Jason Crawford provided some very helpful pinch-hitting in the late innings.

I am blessed with fine colleagues at Saint Anselm College. Dale Kuehne and Paul Manuel, in particular, have been full of enthusiasm and sound advice as I struggled with this book. Donald Cox, Ward Holder, Brother Isaac Murphy, O.S.B., and Beth Salerno made the tasks of research much less solitary and much more fun. Lorie Cochran consistently made day-to-day business easier.

I have worked hard over the past four years to become the second-most knowledgeable person on New Hampshire politics here at Saint Anselm. I am fortunate to have the most knowledgeable person, Michael Dupre of the Sociology Department, as my colleague and friend.

Several of my colleagues in the study of presidential nomination politics were kind enough to read various drafts of my work. To Emmett Buell, Rhodes Cook, Bill Mayer, Patricia Southwell, and Constantine Spiliotes, I say thanks.

David Pervin, my editor at Palgrave Macmillan, has done a hundred things to improve this book, and a lot more of which I am blissfully unaware. He also has shown exceptional patience to a rookie author.

I share with Henry Olsen of the Manhattan Institute a love of baseball, American politics, and the numbers that help us understand them better. This book was born out of countless e-mails between us. Again and again, Henry's dictum, "Why guess when you can look it up?" has driven my research forward, and for that he has my thanks and continued friendship.

Finally, my wife, Julie Alig, continued her uncanny knack of assuring me I could do something when all evidence pointed in the opposite direction. For that and much more, she has, as always, my love. Our son, William Hector, was born during the final stages of this book and has thus far refrained from comment on it.
