This book could not have been written without access to many excellent public and academic libraries and their dedicated staff. In particular, the collections of Leeds University Library, Leeds City Library, the Bodleian Library (Oxford), the British Library, Cambridge University Library, Chetham's Library (Manchester), and the Royal Society Library have been indispensable.

Over the years that this book has been in preparation, I have received kind assistance from many individuals. My thanks are especially due to Wilbur Applebaum, who generously shared with me some of his transcriptions of Flamsteed's handwritten copies of the Gascoigne-Crabtree correspondence; Chris Webb of the Borthwick Institute in York, who expertly answered my questions about arcane aspects of seventeenth-century court records; Christine Brown and Philippa Hoskin, who assisted with the translation of some Latin texts; and Bill Sheehan, who made useful comments on the drafts of some of the early chapters and gave valuable encouragement.

For assistance with the provision of some key illustrations or images, I thank Vanessa Mitchell (Towneley Hall Museum and Art Gallery), Dr. Beatrix Schönwald (Stadtmuseum Ingolstadt), Jo Hopkins and Jennifer Kren (Royal Society), Michael Powell (Chetham's Library), Kerry Magruder (University of Oklahoma Libraries), Chris Sheppard (Leeds University Library), and Don Manning (Cambridge University Library).

I am grateful to the staff at Springer for seeing the book through to publication – especially Harry Blom for having confidence in the project and Jennifer Satten for patiently guiding me through the process.

Finally, I thank my wife Jane and my sons Andrew and Graham for tolerating my interest in (or obsession with!) Gascoigne's story for many years and for reading parts of the manuscript or acting as an instant 'sounding' board for much of the material which has found its way into the book (and lots that rightly hasn't).
