To my father, James Noel Moore who taught me the importance of simply being an ordinary person.

To Ludwig Wittgenstein who, through his philosophy has made me understand why the ordinary, everyday world we live in is so extraordinary.

Acknowledgements

While the ideas behind this book have been coming together over several decades they came into much clearer focus during my study leave in 2017. I would like to thank Lincoln University for the financial support I received for that study leave. In many ways, however, the more important support I received was from my Head of Department, Roslyn Kerr, and the Dean of my Faculty, Greg Ryan. Both encouraged me to take leave and were fully supportive of me spending the time to develop these ideas into book form.

Ideas do not come from nowhere—and not even from one person's mind. I would like to acknowledge the very helpful conversations I have had with John Cromby, of the University of Leicester, and Will Davies, from Goldsmiths, University of London and for allowing me to take up some of their time when I was in the United Kingdom. I am especially grateful for the hospitality and opportunities provided by John Cromby during my short stay as a Visiting Scholar at Leicester.

The unobtrusive but always positive and supportive approach of the editorial team at Palgrave Macmillan, UK has also been much appreciated. From my first meeting with Grace Jackson at the British Psychological Society Conference in Brighton, to my contact via email with Joanna O'Neill and Kumaravel Senbagaraj the responses and advice I have received has been professional, prompt and always friendly.

Finally, I must do more than say 'Thank You!' to my wife Karyn and daughter Brianna. You have made the process so much easier for me by how you have understood the importance of this project to me, made space for me to work, put up with my evening and weekend absences, and never once made me feel like what I was doing was a problem for you. I know I did not always keep up with the work schedules you drew for me Brianna (sorry!) but having you do that for me said so much that was good about our relationship. When it comes to understanding the wellbeing of this person, you are both world experts.
