ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

We have incurred many debts in the researching and writing of this book, especially to our creative and generous colleagues in the vibrant fields of critical trauma and critical disability studies. We hope this book will continue the conversations already taking place within and across these disciplines.

At Palgrave, we thank Shaun Vigil for his immediate support for the concept of this book and his incisive comments and Camille Davies for taking the book to press. We also wish to thank the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript for their thoughtful comments, to which we hope we have done justice.

Throughout the period of researching and writing this book, we have had the privilege of working with two excellent research assistants—Theresa Miller and Rosemary Stevens. We also thank Ceridwen Clocherty for her work in preparing the final manuscript.

Some key aspects of Chap. 5 first appeared in Mick's essay "Heroic Apocalypse: Mad Max, Mythology and the Millennium" in Christopher Sharrett's 1993 edited collection Crisis Cinema: The Apocalyptic Idea in Postmodern Film (Washington, DC: Maisonneuve Press). Mick would like to thank Ross Gibson for his invaluable and insightful "yondering" across the Mad Max cultural terrain during his PhD candidature more than two decades ago. Mick thanks Katie Ellis for her diligence and scholarly acumen and for being such a tolerant (and fun) co-author. Mick also thanks Christine Spiegel for her support, wisdom and grace throughout the research and writing.

Katie would like to thank Curtin University and her colleagues in the discipline of Internet Studies, especially Leanne McRae and Gwyneth Peaty, for their support and willingness to discuss Mad Max. She is also grateful to the Australian Research Council for the privilege of her Discovery Early Career Researcher Award (DE 130101712), of which this book is an output. Katie would like to thank Mick Broderick for a great partnership in collaborating on this book, his suggestion to go see Fury Road immediately and for his encyclopaedic knowledge of Mad Max. Finally, Katie thanks Chris, Stella and Connor Pearce for their love, patience and support but mostly for putting up with her watching the Mad Max movies on repeat “for work”.

LIST OF FIGURES

Fig. 1.1	Miller uses low-angle framing to emphasise impairment, especially lameness, afflicting Max and other characters in the series, often shown wearing braces or calipers to compensate for and minimise the disability	2
Fig. 2.1	A close-up of The Humungus (Kjell Nilsson) revealing scars across his (masked) skull, as he forcibly restrains and consoles mohawk Wez while acknowledging their shared grief and pain	14
Fig. 2.2	One of the Lost Tribe that Max and the other children cannot save, who is consumed by a desert sink-hole	19
Fig. 2.3	Max's traumatic history is literally inscribed and seared into his flesh	22
Fig. 2.4	One of Max's repeated, haunting apparitions (Coco Jack Gillies), "Worming their way into the black matter of [his] brain"	23
Fig. 2.5	Unknown characters in Fury Road on stilts traverse the toxic wasteland that was once the "Green Place" in a mediaeval-esque composition evoking artists Bruegel and Bosch, while merging iconography of disability with eco-trauma	27
Fig. 3.1	Max wordlessly drops his shoulder to offer Furiosa support to shoot at The Bullet Farmer in Fury Road . She makes the shot, blinding him	42
Fig. 3.2	Max first appears in The Road Warrior a "shell of a man" with a full leg brace	43
Fig. 3.3	The Road Warrior's Mechanic uses a hoist for mobility	47
Fig. 4.1	Max cannot bring himself to enter Jessie's hospital room in Mad Max	59
