ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This short book is, first of all, the result of a protracted exchange of ideas between the two authors. What was at beginning intended to be an article on European protest parties became a larger reflection on the contemporary modes of representation especially in southern European countries.

Of course, our debate was also influenced by other exchanges with several colleagues in a number of occasions (conferences, seminars, public discussions), both formal and informal. In this perspective, one of the two authors, Morlino, would like to acknowledge the help the research and book received during his stay at Wissenschaft Zentrum in Berlin, better known as WZB, and warmly to thank Wolfgang Merkel for the invitation and making the stay there effective and pleasant.

The research that is behind the book had the vital help of Marco Lisi for field research in Portugal, Valeria Tarditi for Spain, and Davide Vittori for Greece and Spain as well. Without them especially the chapters on new protest parties would have been much less informed and empirically poorer. We thank them for the crucial help, together with Maurizio Cerruto, Chiara Facello e Stefano Rombi for their help in collecting other empirical data we integrated into the analysis and Lucia Montesanti for helping us with the index.

We also decided to ask a few colleagues and friends to read and criticize a first draft of the manuscript. We gratefully thank Donatella della Porta, Lorenzo De Sio, Liborio Mattina and Angelo Panebianco for all their valuable suggestions that contributed to improve the work. If with a so important help the book still has limits and maybe mistakes the responsibility cannot fall if not on us.

Finally, it is well known how limited are the research funds devoted to social sciences. We were so lucky to receive one of these few grants on ‘Economic crisis and the quality of democracy in Europe’ from the ministry of university and scientific research. Thus, we would like to gratefully acknowledge this help that was necessary for the field research in the four southern European countries.
